

WORKING PAPER

KFG
The Transformative
Power of Europe

From EU Governance of Crisis to Crisis of EU Governance: Regulatory Failure, Redistributive Conflict, and Euroskeptic Publics

Tanja A. Börzel

No. 74 | August 2016

Freie Universität

Berlin

KFG Working Paper Series

Edited by the Kolleg-Forschergruppe “The Transformative Power of Europe”

The KFG Working Paper Series serves to disseminate the research results of the Kolleg-Forschergruppe by making them available to a broader public. It means to enhance academic exchange as well as to strengthen and broaden existing basic research on internal and external diffusion processes in Europe and the European Union.

All KFG Working Papers are available on the KFG website at www.transformeurope.eu or can be ordered in print via email to transform-europe@fu-berlin.de.

Copyright for this issue: Tanja A. Börzel

Editorial assistance and production: Darya Kulinka, Jan Westerbarkei

Börzel, Tanja A. 2016: From EU Governance of Crisis to Crisis of EU Governance: Regulatory Failure, Redistributive Conflict, and Euroskeptic Publics, KFG Working Paper Series, No. 74, August 2016, Kolleg-Forschergruppe (KFG) “The Transformative Power of Europe”, Freie Universität Berlin.

ISSN 1868-6834 (Print)

ISSN 1868-7601 (Internet)

This publication has been funded by the German Research Foundation (DFG).

Freie Universität Berlin
Kolleg-Forschergruppe
“The Transformative Power of Europe:
The European Union and the Diffusion of Ideas”
Ihnestr. 26
14195 Berlin
Germany
Phone: +49 (0)30- 838 57033
Fax: +49 (0)30- 838 57096
transform-europe@fu-berlin.de www.transformeurope.eu

FROM EU GOVERNANCE OF CRISIS TO CRISIS OF EU GOVERNANCE:

REGULATORY FAILURE, REDISTRIBUTIVE CONFLICT, AND EUROSKEPTIC PUBLICS

Tanja A. Börzel

Abstract

This paper takes issue with the widely held view that Europe has failed to govern the multiple crises it has been facing because of too little integration. Rather than a lack of authority, a growing “commitment-compliance gap” has exacerbated the regulatory deficits of EU governance in core areas of the European integration project. The failure of the Member States to put into practice the policies they agreed upon at the EU level has its cause in Euro-nationalists dominating the politicization of EU policies and institutions. They have been empowered by the way in which the Member States have sought to solve the Euro crisis. The growing contestation of and opposition to the EU and its policies per se is not the problem. Nor is it the return of nationalism in Europe or the lack of a European public sphere. Instead of an outright rejection of European integration, we see the mobilization of illiberal, nationalist ideas of Europe, which are exclusionary, xenophobic, and anti-Islam. This paper argues that Euro-nationalism undermines not only the legitimacy but also the effectiveness of EU governance. It has been fueled by the mix of Member State negotiation and competition in the shadow of supranational hierarchy. This has worked for the EU as a regulatory state but is not suitable for dealing with the redistributive issues that have come to dominate important areas of European integration. In fact, simply extending the EU’s governance mix from regulatory to redistributive policies is likely to further undermine its effectiveness and legitimacy.

The Author

Tanja A. Börzel is Professor of Political Science and holds the Chair for European Integration at the Otto Suhr Institute of Political Science, Freie Universität Berlin. Since October 2008, she has been coordinating the Research College “The Transformative Power of Europe” together with Thomas Risse. She also coordinates the H2020 collaborative project EU-STRAT (“The EU and Eastern Partnership Countries: An Inside-Out Analysis and Strategic Assessment”). Her research focus and teaching experience lie in the fields of institutional theory and governance, comparative regionalism, and diffusion of ideas and policies within and outside of the European Union.

Contents

1. Introduction	5
2. The EU's Changing Governance Mix: More of the Same	6
2.1 Varieties of EU Governance	7
2.2 If It Ain't Completely Broken, Don't Fix It!	8
2.3 EU Crisis Management by Default	9
3. The Commitment-Compliance Gap: From Regulation to Redistribution	11
3.1 Masking Redistribution	11
3.2 Defying Redistribution	14
4. Stuck in Postfunctionalist Governance: A Plea for Transnationalized Cosmopolitanism	21
References	23

1. Introduction¹

Financial crisis, Euro crisis, Greek crisis, Crimean crisis, Ukraine crisis, Syria crisis, migration crisis – even the greatest optimist cannot deny that Europe has been suffering through a whole series of crises ever since the Lehman Brothers Bank collapsed in 2008. EU scholars and pundits agree that Europe has failed to govern the multiple crises because the European Union has been too weak to prevent the break-down of banks, contain sovereign debt, generate economic growth, create new jobs, promote stability and democracy in its Southern and Eastern neighborhoods, stop transnational terrorism, and fight climate change. Some even argue that the EU has not only failed to provide solutions but that it is actually part of the problem; undermining the capacity of its Member States to effectively and democratically govern their markets and societies in the 21st century (Majone 2014; Scharpf 2015). Some Eastern European governments may have been most outspoken in claiming that not more but less Europe is the only way to get out of the various crises and avert catastrophe in the future. Dutch, Danish or British politicians, however, have voiced similar arguments supporting David Cameron’s symbolic request to exempt the UK from the goal of “an ever closer union” in the preamble of the Treaties to avoid Brexit.

How much Europe is necessary for effective and legitimate governance in Europe amid enduring crises? Is more or rather less European integration the answer to Europe’s governance failures? This contribution will argue that Europe’s problem is not too little integration – the EU has the power to take action. The Fiscal Pact, the Six-Pack, the European Stability Mechanism, the Banking Union, the sanctions against Russia, the Association Agreement with Ukraine, reallocation quotas for refugees, more than €10 billion for assisting countries inside and outside the EU to cope with the migration flows – these are only some of the more prominent measures the EU has adopted in response to the crises over the past years. Skeptics contend that this is too little too late, particularly in the current migration crisis. Yet, whether the new laws and institutions will be sufficient is hard to tell as long as they have not taken effect. While the Member States have made significant legal and financial commitments at the EU level, many of them have shown little inclination to follow up and comply. This is particularly evident with regard to the EU’s attempt to tackle the historic influx of migrants. Funds are not paid, refugees and asylum-seekers not accepted, laws not implemented and enforced. The EU does not so much lack the capacity to take binding decisions; it is its Member States that do not comply with these decisions. I will use the Euro crisis and the failure of the EU to deal with the migration flows to argue that at the heart of Europe’s crises lies a growing commitment-compliance gap, which has exacerbated the regulatory deficits of EU governance in these two core areas of the European integration project. The failure of Member States to put policies they agreed upon at the EU level into practice has its cause in Euro-nationalists dominating the politicization of EU policies and institutions, who have been empowered by the way in which the Member States sought to solve the Euro crisis. The growing contestation of and opposition to the EU and its policies per se is not the problem. Nor is it the return of nationalism in Europe or the lack of a European public sphere. Instead of an outright rejection of European integration, we see the mobilization of illiberal, nationalist ideas in Europe, which are exclusionary, xenophobic and anti-Islam. I will argue that this Euro-nationalism not only undermines the legitimacy but also the effectiveness of EU governance. It has been fueled by the mix of Member State negotiation and competition in the shadow of supranational hierarchy, which has worked for the EU as a regulatory state but which is not suitable for dealing with the redistributive issues that have come to dominate important areas of European integration. In fact, simply extending the EU's governance mix from regulatory to redistributive policies is likely to further undermine its effectiveness and legitimacy.

¹ The text of this Working Paper emerged from JCMS Annual Review lecture delivered by Tanja Börzel on 12 May 2016 at Europe House in London and was originally published in The JCMS Annual Review of the European Union. If you wish to cite this article, please refer to the original version: Börzel, Tanja 2016: From EU Governance of Crisis to Crisis of EU Governance: Regulatory Failure, Redistributive Conflict and Eurosceptic Publics, in: The JCMS Annual Review of the European Union in 2015 54/S1, 8-31.

In order to develop this argument, the contribution will proceed in three steps. The first part will analyze how the EU has adjusted its governance mix to cope with the Euro crisis. Drawing on my previous work, I will demonstrate that the Euro crises management resulted in a strengthening of supranational centralization, on the one hand, and intergovernmental coordination in the shadow of supranational hierarchy, on the other. The second part will show that the EU has invoked this governance mix to deal with its next crisis caused by the historic influx of migrants and refugees. While it has been able to generate substantial commitment to taking action, the EU faces growing non-compliance problems at the domestic level. I will argue that the refusal of Member State governments to honor their financial and legal commitments is mostly due to increasing politicization driven by the rise of populist forces that mobilize illiberal, nationalist ideas of Europe against the redistributive effects of many EU crises policies.

The contribution will conclude with some considerations on how to solve the EU's governance crisis. I will argue that rather than pursuing a functionalist strategy of deepening European integration, the post-functionalist EU is in need of a new governance mix. Supranational centralization and supranational joint decision-making may be appropriate for regulatory policies. When applied to redistributive issues, they fail to generate sufficient social acceptance at the domestic level. Seeking to depoliticize redistributive policies by delegating them to supranational institutions, such as the European Central Bank, the European Commission, and a European Border and Coast Guard has backfired. The transfer of political authority to EU institutions, which results in a loss of or at least severe constraints on national sovereignty, has fueled opposition to an increasingly intrusive and undemocratic EU, thus empowering Euroskeptical populist forces at both ends of the political spectrum. Rather than being principally opposed to the European integration project, they advocate ideas of an exclusionary, nationalist EU that protects the national sovereignty and cultural heritage of its Member States. These illiberal ideas challenge the effectiveness and the legitimacy of both EU policies and EU institutions. It is necessary to strengthen cosmopolitan voices in the politicization of the EU and its policies that appeal to the Europeanized identities of EU citizens based on shared values of solidarity, liberty, and humanity and thereby upgrade the European common interest and scale up solidarity among Europeans.

2. The EU's Changing Governance Mix: More of the Same

Some EU scholars argue that the EU has been in crisis for the past 40 years starting with the Eurosclerosis in the 1970s and early 1980s. Crisis arose whenever the Member States resisted (further) transfer of political authority to the EU level or opposed EU interference into their domestic affairs even though joint action at the EU level appeared to be clearly needed (Tömmel 2016). In the attempt to "escape from deadlock," the EU developed new modes of governance, such as the Open Method of Coordination (Héritier 1999). But overall, the Member States have institutionalized different combinations of competition and negotiation in the shadow of supranational hierarchy.

2.1 Varieties of EU Governance

To overcome Member State resistance against the harmonization of regulatory standards in the creation of the internal market, the Member States resorted, first, to framework legislation setting common goals and basic rules and procedures leaving it to Member States to implement their own policies. Compliance with EU framework legislation is monitored by the European Commission and the European Court of Justice, while enforcement ultimately lies with the Member States. The subsequent extension of the EU's regulatory competencies and qualified majority voting since the Single European Act 1986 facilitated the use of the Community Method or what I refer to as supranational joint decision-making. The Lisbon Treaty of 2010 made it the default mode of governance, applying to almost all policies of the single market and in the framework of justice and home affairs.

Second, the Member States delegated political authority to independent supranational agencies. The European Commission and the European Central Bank can set and enforce legally binding decisions without requiring the consent of the Member States. This supranational centralization does not only apply to competition and monetary policy. Since the 1990s, the Council has increasingly tasked the Commission with the adoption of EU laws (König et al. 2012). Such delegated or tertiary legislation (Junge et al. 2015) can be adopted by the Commission under the implementing powers given to it by the Treaties (TFEU 2007: Art. 291), or under the delegated powers provided by earlier legal acts. It usually involves further elaboration or updating of standards and technical issues. They are passed through the so-called Comitology procedure, which involves committees consisting of Member State representatives with voting power and the Commission, which sets the agenda and chairs the committee meetings. Decision-making happens behind closed doors and is in stark contrast to the adoption of legal acts under supranational joint decision-making; the European Parliament has the right to comment on whether a draft exceeds the implementing powers of the Commission but has no power to amend or reject the directive.

Third, the principle of mutual recognition established by the ECJ in 1979 with its seminal Cassis de Dijon decision allows high-regulating Member States to maintain their regulatory standards but prevents them from using those standards as non-tariff trade barriers against low-regulating Member States. It constitutes the framework for a moderate regulatory competition between the Member States in the shadow of supranational hierarchy since EU law mandating the opening of national markets generates competitive pressure not only on domestic companies but also on public regulation within the Member States (Sun/Pelkmans 1995:68f). At the same time, the principle of mutual recognition constrains the dynamics of a race to the bottom by requiring that states (implicitly) agree on minimum standards. It thereby significantly expands the shadow of supranational hierarchy in the single market since the dismantling of non-tariff barriers does not require the consent of the Member States—unlike the harmonization of national standards at the EU level. This form of “horizontal transfer of sovereignty” (Nicolaidis/Shaffer 2005) also travelled to other areas where it serves as a functional equivalent to supranational joint decision-making. It has been increasingly invoked in justice and home affairs, for example, in the area of asylum and immigration policy or criminal law, where the national regulations of Member States are too divergent to allow for agreement in the inter- and transgovernmental negotiation systems (Schmidt 2007). The principle of mutual recognition facilitates cross-border law enforcement since different national standards with regard to criminal codes can no longer obstruct judicial cooperation between Member States (Lavenex 2007).

Fourth, transgovernmental networks help supranational, national and subnational public actors to informally coordinate their interests and reach agreements through the exchange of resources and arguments. The shadow of supranational hierarchy generated by majority rule in the Council and judicial review of the ECJ significantly influences the dynamics and outcomes of inter- and transgovernmental negotiation systems. On the one hand, the perceived threat of a majority decision in the Council increases the willingness of governmental actors to come to an agreement. On the other hand, inter- and transgovernmental actors have to make sure that their agreements are likely to stand up to scrutiny by the Commission and the ECJ. The parameters set by their interpretation of European law are not always oriented towards mere market liberalization and free competition but may also support market correcting policies. The “dual mechanism of anticipated reactions and the fleet in being” (Scharpf 1997: 200) is particularly prevalent in the single market but also has an impact on other policy sectors, such as the environment, social policy, and tax policy (Héritier/Lehmkuhl 2008).

These transgovernmental networks also help to fill the “regulatory gap” at the EU level, when Member States have been reluctant to transfer regulatory authority to the EU level and instead delegated them to independent regulatory agencies or ministries at the national level (Coen/Héritier 2006). National regulatory authorities have formed informal networks to exchange information and develop “best practice” rules and procedures to address common problems (Coen/Thatcher 2008). While these regulatory and operational networks may be open to the participation of private actors (e.g. providers and consumers), they are transgovernmental rather than transnational in character (Eberlein/Grande 2005). Even if the Member States have not delegated regulatory competencies to the EU, transgovernmental networks operate under the shadow of supranational framework regulation, which “regulates the regulators” (Eberlein/Grande 2005: 98) by setting minimum requirements for the regulatory regimes in the Member States (Levi-Faur 1999).

2.2 If It Ain't Completely Broken, Don't Fix It!

The EU's governance mix has evolved over time developing different varieties of inter- and transgovernmental negotiation and regulatory competition in the shadow of supranational hierarchy (Börzel 2010, 2012). Economic and Monetary Union (EMU) combines supranational centralization in the form of delegating the authority to make monetary policy to the European Central Bank (ECB) with the intergovernmental coordination of national economic policies in the Euro-group to safe-guard macro-economic stability in the shadow of the Stability and Growth Pact and the Excessive Deficit Protocol Procedure, on the one hand, and the competition of national economic systems in the Internal Market, on the other. Asylum and migration policy mixes supranational decision-making to set common standards on the treatment of asylum seekers and refugees in the Schengen passport-free area and regulatory competition in the shadow of supranational hierarchy to facilitate cross-border law enforcement.

Both governance regimes have been criticized for Member States giving up rather than transferring political authority to the EU level. Monetary union deprives Euro countries of key instruments of macroeconomic management without providing the EU e.g. with the ability to contradict the effects of cheap credit availability resulting from the uniformity of ECB interest rates (Scharpf 2015, 2016; Streeck/Elsässer 2016). In a similar vein, the Schengen states abolished internal border controls without creating a common external border control and a common administration to handle asylum seekers and refugees. Despite these birth defects, however, the Euro and Schengen appeared to work well enough.

Warnings that the governance mix of EMU failed to ensure sufficient convergence among surplus and deficit countries were ignored (Bayoumi/Eichengreen 1993; Scharpf 2015; Streeck/Elsässer 2016), demands by Spain, Italy, and Greece for burden-sharing dismissed (Thielemann/El-Enany 2010). The Stability and Growth Pact and the Excessive Deficit Procedure Protocol were to impose fiscal discipline on the Member States to prevent spillover effects from unsustainable national deficits. Re-admission agreements with neighboring countries were to limit the number of asylum seekers to be handled by the Member States in charge of protecting the EU's external borders.

Only when the EU was hit by the collapse of US real estate banks in 2008, and after Libya and Syria collapsed in 2011, respectively, did the Member States have to acknowledge the deficits of the regulatory governance mixes. Since the EU lacked the political authority for a forceful response to both crises, Member States have resorted to unilateral action – bailing out their domestic banks, stopping the registration of refugees and asylum seekers, passing them on to their neighbors, taking them on without registration, and closing off their borders.

2.3 EU Crisis Management by Default

Since EMU and the Schengen regime have deprived the Member States of core instruments to mitigate external asymmetric shocks, unilateral action has done little to manage the crises. Consequently, and rather reluctantly, Member State governments sought to find common solutions at the EU level. To prevent the breakdown of the Eurozone and protect the common currency against future challenges, the Euro countries established a whole set of supranational institutions which constitute the most far-reaching deepening of European integration since the creation of the EMU in 1999 – without even touching the Treaties. Rather than fundamentally changing the previous governance mix by establishing a “new intergovernmentalism” (Bickerton et al. 2014), the Fiscal Compact, the European Stability Mechanism, the Banking Union, the Macro-economic Imbalance Mechanism, and the European Semester reinforce supranational centralization and inter- and transgovernmental coordination as the two main governance modes of EMU, placing the latter under a strict shadow of supranational hierarchy.

Certainly, the European Council has played a key role in making decisions responding to the crisis (Bickerton/Hodson/Puetter 2014; Puetter 2014). However, this does not necessarily imply a weakening of supranational institutions (Dinan 2016; Fabbrini 2013; Nugent/Rhinard 2016). The Commission was tasked to transform Member State decisions into technical proposals for legislative measures, including the Six Pack and the Two Pack adopted by supranational decision-making, i.e. the ordinary or special legislative procedure. The Macro-economic Imbalance Mechanism and the European Semester substantially strengthen the budgetary and macro-economic surveillance capacities of the Commission (Savage/Verdun 2016). Tightening the rules for fiscal discipline of the Stability and Growth Pact and giving the Commission the power to monitor Member State fiscal activities and sanction excessive deficits and debts cast a substantial shadow of supranational hierarchy over the intergovernmental coordination of economic, fiscal, and budgetary policies that formally remain the political authority of the Member States; but supranational rules and surveillance severely limit Member State discretion.

In a similar vein, the Banking Union creates supranational banking rules (single rulebook) and centralizes banking supervision in the hands of the ECB to avert market failure caused by banks (Hodson 2016). The so-called Single Supervisory Mechanism provides for the monitoring and enforcement of a common regulatory framework formed by a series of directives, adopted under supranational decision-making. It also includes the Capital Requirements Regulation and Directive implementing the Basel III capital requirements for banks, the Deposit Guarantee Scheme Directive regulating deposit insurance, and the Bank Recovery and Resolution Directive, which establishes the Single Resolution Mechanism and the Single Resolution Fund to regulate and finance the restructuring of troubled banks (de Rynk 2016). As the European Commission, the ECB obtained comprehensive surveillance powers, which comprise full access to bank data and the right to carry out onsite inspections. The new system takes away Member State authority for financial supervision under the Lamfalussy Process, which provided at best a “light touch” regulation (Quaglia 2010).

Strengthening supranational centralization and placing intergovernmental coordination under a shadow of supranational hierarchy may be a rupture with the past approach of centralized monetary and decentralized economic policy (de Rynk 2016). Yet, it is fully in line with the EU’s default strategy to deepen integration in the face of Member State resistance against a transfer of political authority to the EU level by supranational centralization (cf. Chalmers/Jachtenfuchs/Joerges 2016b). This also applies to the changing role of the ECB, which similar to the Commission, has transformed from a technocratic supranational agent with a very specific mandate into a political actor taking monetary decisions with redistributive consequences, such as quantitative easing or purchasing government debt on secondary markets, while being shielded against political and electoral accountability (Chang 2016: 493).

The changes in the EU’s governance mix are also a far cry from calls for a genuine social and political Union, which would have the legal and fiscal authority to protect and support specific social rights (Habermas 2013). The incremental adjustments of the previous governance mix not only raise questions about its effectiveness in preventing future crisis (Scharpf 2016). They also heighten problems of legitimacy since supranational centralization and intergovernmental coordination in the shadow of supranational hierarchy do hardly provide for the democratic control and participation of the German Constitutional Court demands and EU scholars deem necessary to counter the increasing Euroscepticism among EU citizens (Fasone 2013; Risse 2015b; Hix 2015).

Whether the reform of the existing governance mix will suffice to protect the Eurozone against future external shocks is beyond the scope of this contribution. What is of interest here is that the default strategy of the EU to respond to the refugee crisis by resorting to supranational centralization and inter- and transgovernmental coordination in the shadow of supranational hierarchy has not worked. Quite the contrary: I argue attempts at depoliticizing controversial issues by supranational centralization silencing public controversies over EU policies and EU institutions have backfired, turning the “constraining dissensus” (Hooghe/Marks 2009) into Euroskepticism (Grande/Kriesi 2014). The politicization of the EU as a polity by populist politicians mostly on the right has not only made it impossible for Member State governments to agree on creating new supranational institutions, such as a European Border and Coast Guard, or supranational rules for intergovernmental coordination, such as institutionalized reallocation quota. It also undermines their compliance with decisions already adopted under supranational joint decision-making or intergovernmental coordination bringing the entire Schengen system down.

3. The Commitment-Compliance Gap: From Regulation to Redistribution

The combination of negotiation and competition in the shadow of supranational hierarchy has prevented and corrected market failures (on the EU model of regulatory governance see Eckert 2011; Finger 2011). Yet, it has clear limits when dealing with issues of redistribution. In (re-)distributive policy areas, such as taxation of mobile capital, employment, social policy, or economic governance, the Member States have been very reluctant to resort to supranational joint decision-making and supranational centralization in order to counteract politically undesired outcomes of the Internal Market. At the same time, EU market and monetary integration impedes the Member States in maintaining such functions. The single currency largely deprives the Member States of their core instruments for national macroeconomic stabilization, while the fiscal austerity rules put serious constraints on state expenditures. Softer modes of governance (intergovernmental negotiations and competition) are unlikely to respond to this “European problem-solving gap” (Scharpf 2006: 855), elucidated once again by the financial crisis.

3.1 Masking Redistribution

The imminent threat of sovereign debt has been contained and there are signs that the economies of the crisis countries are recovering, with the exception of Greece (Featherstone forthcoming). Yet, the South of Europe continues to suffer from long-term developmental problems. So far, “hard” supranational centralization to discipline the banking sector and Member State spending policies has done little to narrow the gap between the EU’s Northern core and its Southern (and Eastern) periphery since they do little to tackle the structural weaknesses that hold back Spain’s, Portugal’s, Greece’s, and Italy’s capacity to grow and adjust to economic shocks (European Commission 2016b).² This would require the EU to address the overall low governance capacities of debtor countries, their poor education and skills, weak productivity performance, and very poor multi-factor productivity scores (Molina/Rhodes 2008; Bohle/Greskovits 2012; van ² In the Country Reports published in the framework of the European Semester 2016, the European Commission considers these structural weaknesses the key challenge for the recovery and growth potential of European economies. The reports are available at http://ec.europa.eu/europe2020/making-it-happen/country-specific-recommendations/index_en.htm; 27 February 2016.

Ark et al. 2013). The failure to do so has increased the democratic legitimacy deficit of the EU by isolating political decisions from institutional and electoral accountability, both at the EU and the national level (Scharpf 2015; Streeck/Elsässer 2016; De Wilde et al. 2016). What is more, rather than alleviating the social costs of the Euro crisis, the reformed EU governance mix interferes with domestic economic and social policy producing or at least exacerbating redistributive effects that are now attributed to the EU (Hix 2015; Scharpf 2015; Polyakova/Fligstein 2016). Through their financial guarantees, assistance, and interventions, the ESM and the ECB, directly or indirectly, have engaged in massive redistribution among and within the Member States. The Euro crisis has definitely turned EMU into a redistributive issue by increasing the scale and the visibility of redistribution.

To be sure, EMU has never been a purely regulatory issue. While the Member States could not agree on supranationalizing economic, fiscal, and budgetary policies, it was clear that overcoming the diverging economic performance between Northern surplus and Southern deficit countries would require some financial transfer by the former to help the latter raise productivity (Streeck/Elsässer 2016). The Structural Funds were to provide fiscal assistance to buffer economic and social adjustment costs imposed by the Internal Market (Hooghe 1996; George/Bache 2001), and later the common currency. However, with Eastern enlargement, the Southern European Euro countries had to increasingly share the funds with the new Member States in Central and Eastern Europe. Maintaining their initial level of financial transfer would have required an increase of the EU budget from one to four percent of the EU's GDP, which the net payers and surplus Euro countries rejected insisting that competitiveness could only be improved by austerity and structural reforms aiming for self-sufficiency (Streeck/Elsässer 2016: 17-19). The drop in EU financial assistance for the deficit countries was at least partly compensated by access to cheap credit, which, however, was used for consumption rather than investment (Scharpf 2015).

When the deficit countries had to go into sovereign debt to bail out their troubled banks, the surplus countries came to the rescue. Cheap credit was made conditional on the implementation of austerity programs and stringent enforcement of fiscal restructuring and structural reforms, overseen by the International Monetary Fund, the European Commission, and the European Central Bank. To support Member States with substantial public debt, two temporary rescue funds were set up in 2010, which are the European Financial Stabilization Mechanism (EFSM), guaranteed by the European Commission through the EU budget, and the European Financial Stability Facility (EFSF), guaranteed by the Eurozone members. These temporary lending facilities were replaced in 2012 with the European Stability Mechanism (ESM), a permanent European emergency fund with a lending capacity of €500 billion. The various bailout mechanisms and rescue packages have turned the EU by all practical means into a transfer union – despite the “no bailout clause” (TFEU 2007: Art. 123).

The prohibition on international compensation payments in the Maastricht Treaty is no more than pro forma: with significant performance differences between countries joined in a monetary union, there is no way around some sort of inter-country redistribution (Streeck/Elsässer 2016: 8).

Many argue that the installed transfer mechanisms are not enough to deal with the economic and social costs of the Euro crises and the structural reforms the creditor countries demand in return for their financial solidarity. In order to help Member States equalize the regional effects of asymmetrical shocks and raise the productivity of deficit countries, the EU needs to become a genuine fiscal union replacing intergovernmental economic policy coordination under “soft law” (Hodson/Maher 2001) with a common taxation, pension, and employment insurance system (Scharpf 2015; Streeck/Elsässer 2016). Moreover, the EU would have to make sure that the Member States engage in stronger redistribution at the domestic level – inequality and social exclusion are not only an issue among but increasingly more within the Member States (Copsey 2015: Chapter 1). The required redistribution would be of such magnitude that the economic growth in surplus countries would no longer suffice to pay for the fiscal transfers. Nor would the necessary transfer of political authority find sufficient support among political elites and mass publics in Europe given that already the distribution of the adjustment burden between creditor and debtor countries in the Euro crisis has been the most divisive conflict (Genschel/Jachtenfuchs 2016b).

Unwilling to change the treaties to give the EU substantial redistributive authority, the Member State governments have sought to depoliticize redistributive issues by masking them behind regulatory policies (Genschel/Jachtenfuchs 2016a). Regulatory policies do have redistributive implications (Wilson 1980). Yet, these are mostly felt at the implementation stage and concealed by imposing the same obligations on all Member States (Majone 1994). As a result, Member States have found it less difficult to transfer regulatory authority to the EU level and to agree on common regulatory policies. Not surprisingly then, the creditor countries have framed the Euro crisis as a regulatory issue, a problem of too lenient fiscal and budgetary rules and too lax enforcement (Chang 2016: 495). The solution, hence, is not fiscal transfer but compliance with stricter austerity rules and structural reforms enforced by the Commission and the ECB, which will enable debtor countries to become self-sufficient. Financial assistance is only a temporary means to buffer adjustment costs and help build reform capacities.

Yet, regulatory governance is ultimately inadequate to deal with redistributive issues (Majone 1994), particularly if it seeks to mask instead of addressing them. The Euro crisis marks “the end of the Eurocrats’ dream” (Chalmers et al. 2016a) of ever closer harmonization through technocratic integration. The failure to recognize the need for a different governance mix to tackle redistribution that does not rely on supranational centralization and limits supranational joint decision-making has further politicized the EU as a system of governance whose democratic credentials are not only questioned by populist politicians and citizens rallying against the socio-economic effects of the crisis but by the constitutional courts of several Member States, which have reserved the right to review and, if necessary, nullify changes in the EU’s governance mix (Fabbrini 2014; Joerges 2016). As a result, the willingness of Member States to comply with EU austerity rules and procedures is waning. Greece may ultimately have no choice since it is insolvent (Featherstone 2016). But the governments in Portugal, Spain, and Ireland have demanded more flexibility, for example in assessing Member States’ budget, and growth policies, so have France and Italy, which never fully complied with the EU’s deficit rules in the first place. It remains to be seen to what extent the financial markets will instil budgetary discipline. The EU itself has only limited authority and capacity to enforce its laws and decisions. The reliance on Member State enforcement authorities allowed the EU to externalize compliance costs but turned “[n]ational administrations both [...] vehicles for securing its goals and the central impediments to realising them” (Chalmers et al. 2016b: 9). The massive redistributive effects of EU regulatory governance on the domestic level have exacerbated the divergence between EU decision-making and enforcement capacities.

Open non-compliance with supranational rules does not only render EU law ineffective; it fuels the politicization of the EU between compliant and non-compliant Member States (Genschel/Jachtenfuchs 2016b: 50). While the former denounce the illegitimate interference with national democratic sovereignty, the latter emphasize that the EU is a community of law, in which pacta sunt servanda. The EU had been a latent cleavage in most of the Member States before the Euro crisis (Hooghe/Marks 2009). However, the politicization of EU policies and institutions has not only intensified since the EU has been confronted with a growing influx of migrants and refugees. Many claim that is also nationally segmented, dividing EU citizens along national boundaries (De Wilde et al. 2016; Genschel/Jachtenfuchs 2016b: 49; Polyakova/Fligstein 2016). We still lack the data to measure how Europeanized the politicization of migration actually is. I will argue below that the biggest challenge for EU governance is that politicization is dominated by populist positions advocating illiberal, nationalist ideas of Europe that do not principally oppose the EU but promote an EU that is different from the liberal modernization project that has been constitutive for European integration so far.

Populist forces have not been able to constrain supranational centralization of monetary policy and the building of a strong shadow of supranational hierarchy over intergovernmental coordination of economic policy. Member State governments successfully managed to depoliticize and shield decision-making against public scrutiny and to silence public debates by avoiding treaty reforms, using secondary legislation (e.g. Six Pack, Two Pack), establishing treaties outside the EU framework (e.g. Fiscal Compact), and delegating decision-making powers to non-majoritarian, technocratic supranational bodies (e.g. Banking Union) (Howarth/Quaglia 2013, Schimmelfennig 2014: 336; Genschel/Jachtenfuchs 2016b: 54; Grande/Kriesi 2016: 399; Kriesi 2016). Yet, the successful attempts of Member State governments at managing the Euro crisis by “integration by stealth” (Majone 2005) has come at a price to be paid once the next crisis hit. When controversial EU policies are isolated from political and electoral accountability, citizens, political parties, and interest groups redirect their opposition and discontent with these policies towards the EU as a polity as such contesting its legitimacy to make such policies in the first place (Mair 2007).

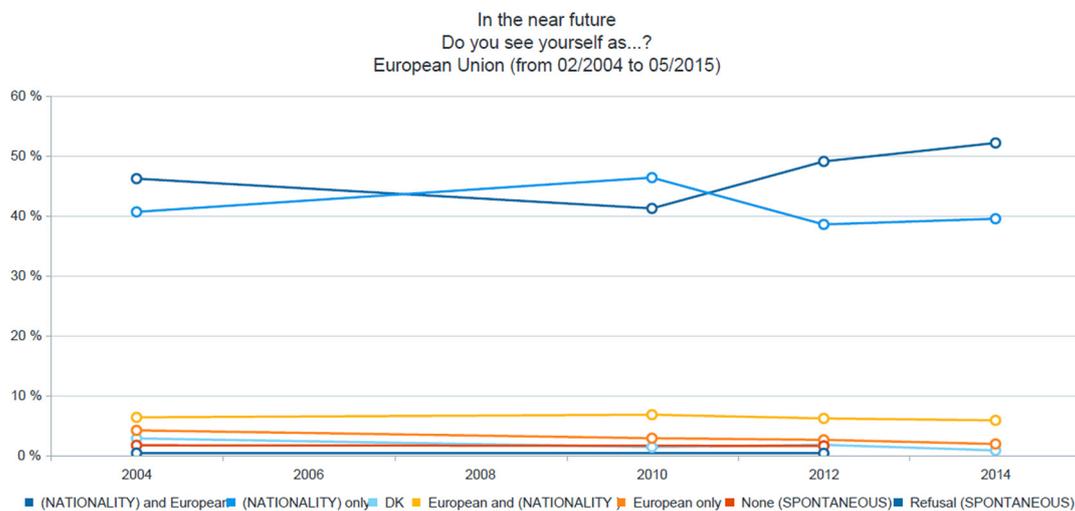

3.2 Defying Redistribution

Given the seeming success of integration by stealth in mastering the Euro crisis, the Commission and the Member States resorted to the same strategy to cope with the historical influx of migrants. Yet, this time, they have not been able to use supranational centralization to depoliticize redistributive issues by masking them behind regulatory policies. This is not only because migration and refugee policies touch upon core issues of state sovereignty and national identity, which are particularly likely to get politicized (Genschel/Jachtenfuchs 2016b: 52). The failure of the EU to come to terms with the redistributive implications of the Euro crisis have empowered Euro-nationalist positions in many Member States to an extent that their governments are not only constrained in making commitments at the EU level for joint decisions but lack the political support to comply with them domestically.

Particularly citizens who were hit worst by the Euro crisis have felt that the EU failed to provide supranational solutions to problems caused by European integration (Polyakova/Fligstein 2016: 61). The EU not only stopped being part of the solution; for many citizens particularly in Southern Europe it has become part of the problem (Kriesi 2016; Majone 2014; Scharpf 2015). As a result, European citizens have increasingly turned to their national governments to provide for solutions and protect their interests. This has not, however, resulted in a nationalist backlash as claimed by Polyakova and Fligstein (2016). Most Europeans still believe that crises require European rather than national solutions (Risse 2014). Nor do survey data support a surge of nationalist identities, i.e. growing numbers of Europeans who identify exclusively with their nation state (see Figure 1). With the exception of summer 2010, the identification levels with the EU have increased or remained stable during the Euro crisis, including in the debtor countries (Risse 2014). This should not be too surprising since the literature has found no evidence for a strong impact of the EU and its institutions on the Europeanization of national identities (cf. Checkel/Katzenstein 2009).

Figure 1: Identification with the EU (EU Average, 2004-2015)

Source: Eurobarometer database, in: <http://ec.europa.eu/COMMFrontOffice/PublicOpinion/index.cfm/Chart/getChart/chartType/lineChart//themeKy/41/groupKy/206/savFile/190>; 24 February 2016.

Whether the “Europeanization of national identities is sufficient to sustain carefully crafted (re-)distributive policies on the European level” (Risse 2014: 1208; Kuhn/Stoeckel 2014) is still debated in the literature (skeptical: Polyakova/Fligstein 2016; Streeck/Elsässer 2016). In early 2016, a majority of 57 percent of EU citizens continues to support EMU and more than two thirds of EU citizens still want a common European policy on migration.³ I argue that the effectiveness and legitimacy of EU governance is undermined by the growing politicization of the EU that is not so much anti-Europe or nationally segment but dominated by appeals to illiberal, nationalist ideas of Europe, which are exclusionary and anti-Islam. Acknowledging that the politicization of the EU and European integration is a cyclical rather than a linear process and differs across (groups of) Member States (Kriesi 2016), political conflict over the EU has intensified in public media and party competition (Statham/Trenz 2014; De Wilde et al. 2016; Grande/Kriesi 2016). With the Euro crisis, citizens have not only become more aware of and worried about EU governance; their attitudes have become more polarized rather than being neutral, ambivalent or indifferent towards the EU (De Wilde et al. 2016). Arguably, the level of politicization is not as unprecedented as some scholars argue (Schimmelfennig 2014: 322; Risse 2015a; Grande/Kriesi 2016; De Wilde et al. 2016); nor does it necessarily have to constrain further integration as claimed by post-functionalists (Hooghe/Marks 2009) or undermine the EU's output legitimacy by paralyzing EU decision-making (Scharpf 2009, 2015). Replacing "politics without policy" (Schmidt 2006) with "politics about polity" (De Wilde et al. 2016: 14) in the Member States can strengthen democracy by enabling citizens to make better informed choices as well as by fostering diffuse support for and identification with the EU (Follesdal 2015; Harrison/Bruter 2015). Hence, politicization can both promote and impair the deepening and broadening of European integration depending on certain scope conditions (Zürn 2012; Risse 2014; Genschel/Jachtenfuchs 2016b; Grande/Kriesi 2016; De Wilde et al. 2016).

³ See Public Opinion section on the European Commission’s website: <http://ec.europa.eu/COMMFrontOffice/PublicOpinion/index.cfm/Chart/getChart/themeKy/29/groupKy/180>; 29 February 2016.

The crisis of EU governance is neither caused by politicization per se nor by its national segmentation. The Eurozone crisis and the migration flows have been framed as European issues of common concern and have been debated in transnationally interconnected public spheres (Risse 2014). However, the growing politicization of EU affairs is dominated by a peculiar type of "politics about polity," which takes place along the "cosmopolitan-nationalist" cleavage. This new cultural cleavage emerged as a consequence of globalization (Grande/Kriesi 2016). Rather than being a "pro- and anti-EU cleavage" (Grande/Kriesi 2014: 191), it counters liberal ideas of Europe embodied by the values of enlightenment, such as human rights, democracy, rule of law, and market economy, with nationalist and xenophobic ideas of Europe based on an essentialist interpretation of the continent's Christian heritage (Kriesi 2016; Risse 2010). An emerging "cleavage coalition" (Grande/Kriesi 2014) of Euroskeptical political forces on the radical right of the political spectrum have exploited the cosmopolitan-nationalist cleavage that pitches the winners from globalization and European integration against its losers (Fligstein 2009; Kriesi et al. 2008). Using Euro-nationalist frames and claims advocating an exclusionary and anti-globalist "fortress Europe," the Front National in France, the United Kingdom Independence Party (UKIP), the Party for Freedom in the Netherlands, the Freedom Party Austria (FPÖ), the Sweden Democrats, the Danish People's Party, the Alternative for Germany (AfD), Hungary's Fidesz, or increasingly Poland's Law and Justice Party (PiS) have managed to mobilize the fears, the discontent and the frustrations of those Europeans who perceive themselves as the losers of European integration pressures, more broadly speaking. This Euro-nationalist mobilization feeding on the "politics of fear" (Wodak 2015) takes place in transnationally interconnected public spheres and has been increasingly successful in electoral politics because supporters of cosmopolitan Europe have sought to silence debates on EU affairs rather than defend liberal values (Grande/Kriesi 2014).

As expected by postfunctionalism, the dominance of Euro-nationalist positions in the politicization of EU affairs has increasingly impaired an upgrading of the common European interest (Hooghe/Marks 2009; Mair 2007). The "constraining dissensus," which had replaced the "permissive consensus" in the past two decades, is increasingly turning into opposition not so much against Europe per se but against the liberal values, including solidarity, liberty, and humanity, around which the European project has been constructed. Member States were able to circumvent domestic opposition in the Euro crisis by supranational delegation. At the same time, however, their attempts at depoliticizing the management of the Euro crisis empowered populist forces advocating an illiberal, nationalist Europe. As a result, governments are not only constrained but increasingly prevented from reaching common European solutions necessary to tackle the migration and refugee challenges rather than merely seeking to externalize them.

Interestingly, the governance failure of the EU in coming to terms with the migration flows is not only and maybe not even primarily related to deadlock in decision-making. Between the end of September 2015 and the end of April 2016, the Member States agreed on a whole set of joint measures aiming at “sharing the responsibility” (Council of the European Union 2015b) for the refugees who had already entered the territory of the EU, on the one hand, and managing future migration flows, on the other (Monar 2016). Action was taken by supranational decision-making, drawing on the EU’s legal framework for a common asylum and migration policy. Core measures include the Asylum, Migration and Integration Fund (AMIF) set up for the period 2014-2020 with a total of €2.4 billion for the management of migration flows by the Member States, including registration, integration, and return; the adoption of a common list of safe countries of origin; the reallocation of 120,000 “persons in clear need of international protection”; the establishment of additional hot spots in Italy (five) and Greece (six); and the deployment of additional 165 FRONTEX experts to Greece and Italy to help with the registration of refugees (Council of the European Union 2015b; European Commission 2015a, 2015b, 2015c, 2015d, 2015e; European Parliament/European Council, 2014, 2015). The three EU agencies operating on migration-related issues (FRONTEX, the European Asylum Support Office/EASO, and Europol) also received a reinforcement of 120 new staff members (European Commission 2015j: 6).

Regarding the stronger protection of the EU’s external border, the rescue of refugees and the fight against human trafficking and smuggling, the EU created a new military operation (EUNAVFOR MED) in the Mediterranean Sea in May 2015, and tripled the budget for its already existing operations, Triton and Poseidon in December 2015 (Council of the European Union 2015a; European Commission 2015g).

To support third countries that host refugees or are located at major migration routes to the EU, the EU earmarked more than €2 billion within the framework of its European Neighborhood Policy and Development Cooperation, respectively, including the launching of the Madad Trust Fund for Syria (€654 million) in December 2014, and the Emergency Trust Fund for Africa (€1.8 billion) in November 2015 (European Commission 2014, 2015f). To help Greece and other Member States struggling with the influx of refugees, in March 2016, the Commission unveiled plans for a refugee emergency fund of €700 million to be disbursed over the next three years. Rather than national governments, the assistance targets aid organizations on the ground, such as UN agencies and non-governmental networks (Zalan 2016a).

In October 2015, the EU agreed to assist transit countries in the Western Balkans, which are current or potential candidates for EU membership, with a plan containing no fewer than 17 points, aimed at building additional reception capacities along the Western Balkan route and stepping up national and coordinated efforts to return migrants not in need of international protection with the help of EU financial and technical assistance (European Commission 2015k). One of the points also refers to an EU-Turkey Joint Action Plan to help Turkey host, register, and readmit migrants and control its borders with Greece and Bulgaria in return for financial assistance, visa liberalization, and the opening of new chapters in Turkey’s accession process, which has stalled for almost ten years. The original €1 billion for setting up six additional refugee camps in Turkey were stepped up to a €3 billion Facility for Refugees at the EU-Turkey summit on November 29, 2015, when the Joint Action Plan was activated (European Commission 2015h).

These are only the most important measures, the vast majority of which the EU adopted in less than three months under EU primary and secondary law. The coordinated European response, however, has failed to reach a fair sharing of responsibility for “registering and processing people in need of protection and returning those who are not to their home countries or safe third countries they are transited through” (European Commission 2016a: 3). Maybe, over €10 billion and a series of legal measures are insufficient to accomplish these goals. However, we will probably never know because Member States have squarely refused to put most of them into practice.⁴

Denmark opted out of the AMIF while the other 27 have been slow in implementing projects. Some Member States have amended their lists of safe countries of origin, adding e.g. the Western Balkan countries; others, however, still do not even foresee the notion of safe countries in their national legislation, despite the legal obligation under the Asylum Procedures Directive. By April 2016, only 615 refugees and asylum seekers have been relocated. Slovakia and Hungary, which have challenged the reallocation scheme at the ECJ, as well as Slovenia and Croatia have refused to take any refugees and asylum seekers at all; the UK does not have to because it opted out of Schengen but agreed to take 20,000 from Syria directly. So did Ireland, which offered to accept 20 on a voluntary base. The remaining 19 Member States have made available not more than a total of 4,575 places (European Commission 2016a: Annex 2). Only three of the additional 11 hot spots are operational (Italy: 2, Greece: 1) (European Commission 2016a: 8f). The Commission is still waiting for the Member States to send additional experts for FRONTEX and EASO (European Commission 2016a: 9). Funding pledged by the Member States outside their obligation under the EU budget has not fully been met. Of the €654 million committed to the Madad Trust Fund for Syria, €594 million has come from the EU budget, but only €60.5 million from 19 Member States. The Trust Fund for Africa is approaching the €1.8 billion pledged, but funding from the Member States that is to match the EU’s contribution amount to under €82 million (European Commission 2016a: 7).

Most of the 17 points on which the European Council and the Western Balkan countries had agreed in October 2015 were turned obsolete by the meeting “Managing Migration Together” of the Austrian government and nine Western Balkan countries in Vienna on February 24, 2016 to which neither Greece nor any representative of the EU were invited (Bundesministerium für Inneres der Republik Österreich 2016). In the absence of a European solution, the governments agreed that national measures had to be taken: tightening border controls. Instead of creating reception capacities for 50,000 refugees along the Balkan route and providing temporary shelter, food, water, and sanitation for people in need, Croatia, Slovenia, and Serbia followed the example of Austria and introduced daily caps for people allowed to apply for asylum or transiting to other countries. Macedonia has effectively closed its border to Greece, only letting in a limited number of refugees from Syria and Iraq every day. This comes close to the “Plan B” the four Visegrad Countries (V4) called for in their meeting with the heads of state of Macedonia and Bulgaria on February 15, 2016, shifting the EU’s external border to Greece’s with Macedonia and Bulgaria in case of Greece not being able to control its border with Turkey (Zalan 2016b). The coordinated unilateralism of the Western Balkan candidate countries and some Member States, including Austria, the V4, and Bulgaria, is building up a humanitarian crisis in Greece, where thousands of migrants have stranded.

Regarding the EU-Turkey Joint Action Plans, on which all hopes for a common European solution rest now, neither the Member States nor Turkey had implemented any of their commitments during the first three months after the agreement had been reached (European Commission 2016a: 18f). No money had been transferred to Turkey, which is reluctant to tighten the control of its borders with Greece, take on criminal networks of traffickers and smugglers, or readmit migrants. To tackle the issue of non-implementation, the EU signed an agreement with Turkey on March 18, 2016 introducing a “one in, one out” policy. In exchange for each “irregular” migrant that Turkey takes back from Greece, the EU will resettle one Syrian refugee from Turkey. Moreover, the EU allotted another €3 billion to help Turkey provide temporary protection for Syrians. The up to 72,000 Syrians will be resettled according to a reallocation scheme agreed by the EU for the 120,000 refugees. In the first two weeks of April, some five hundred refugees were sent back from Greece to Turkey and an equivalent number of Syrians resettled in the EU. More than ten times the number of new refugees arrived on Greek islands during that time. Most of them immediately filed for asylum, so did many of the 50,000 stranded already in the country after the closure of the Western Balkan route. Greek authorities will have to process thousands of applications and provide the applicants, who have the right to appeal in court, with a place to stay. Whether the economically battered country, whose asylum system has been so deficient that the European Court of Human Rights ruled that EU Member States must not return people there, will be able to cope is an open question. Next to employing 4,000 additional judges, case officers, translators, and border guards, Greece will have to establish the necessary administrative and legal procedures and turn its already ill-equipped hotspots (asylum processing facilities) into proper reception facilities and detention centers. The EU and the other Member States have promised to provide 2,300 experts and will foot most of the €300 million the operation is estimated to cost. Yet, the legal responsibility and administrative burden has been again placed on Greece instead of sharing them equally among the Member States. Moreover, it remains to be seen how many of the Member States will be willing to accept Syrian refugees to be resettled from Turkey. Finally, it is unclear what will happen if the refugee flows return to their previous routes through Libya into Italy. While the number of migrants crossing the Aegean from Turkey into Greece has declined, those crossing to Italy have more than doubled since the EU-Turkey agreement entered into force. We will have to see whether European courts will accept Turkey as a safe country, to which migrants can only be returned under EU law – Libya they will certainly not. Austria already announced tighter checks on its border with Italy in anticipation of a surge in migrants. And on May 5, 2016, the Commission agreed to extend select internal border controls introduced by Austria, Germany, Denmark, and Sweden, for another six months due to a lack of effective external controls by Greece.

4 For the most recent assessment of the progress or lack thereof, see European Commission 2016a.

Europe has never seemed further away from a joint solution. The non-compliance with commitments Member States have made over the past six months has resulted in the break-down of the Common European Asylum System and total defiance of the Schengen rules. Greece and Italy as Member States of first entry stopped registering and accommodating migrants some time ago. They never really managed to return migrants not qualifying for asylum or refugee status to their country of origin (European Commission 2016a: 9f). Returning migrants to Greece as a country of first entry (Dublin transfers) has not been possible since 2010, not least because the European Court of Human Rights and the European Court of Justice have raised concerns about the human rights situation (European Commission 2016a: 10). This is one of the reasons why the German government in September 2015 unilaterally decided not to turn back any migrants at its border. Whether this decision encouraged even more migrants to make their way to Europe, is an open question. However, the use of daily caps to restrict access or the building of razor-wire fences to stop them altogether are a violation of both EU Schengen rules and international law.

To be fair, non-compliance with the Common European Asylum System had been a problem before the historical influx of migrants hit the EU. In 2015, Commission took legal action against virtually all Member States for not applying the five directives the EU had adopted between 2001 and 2011 to provide minimum standards on asylum procedures, reception conditions for asylum seekers, temporary protection and recognition of refugees, and the deportation of illegal migrants as well as the Dublin and Eurodac fingerprinting regulations (European Commission 2016a: 19f).

In the face of blatant non-compliance with existing EU laws and decisions, the Commission has pushed for supranational centralization. Next to turning the EASO into the “European Union Agency for Asylum” with new powers to monitor and evaluate Member States’ policies, it called for the creation of an EU Border and Coast Guard Agency (EBCG) to replace the European Agency for the Management of Operational Cooperation at the External Borders of the Member States of the EU (FRONTEX)(European Commission, 2015i). It shall monitor the EU’s external borders to ensure that EU legal standards for border management are implemented. In order to strengthen its surveillance capacity, the staff of FRONTEX will be doubled and a rapid reserve pool of border guards put at its disposal. Most importantly, similar to the European Central Bank under the Single Supervisory Mechanism, the EBCG will be able to require Member States to take timely corrective action; in case of failure to do so, the EBCG would be empowered to intervene directly, without the consent of the Member State concerned. Finally, a European Return Office, created within EBCG, will deploy European Return Intervention Teams to return illegally staying third country nationals. The EU border guards could also enforce the mandatory and semi-automatic mechanism for redistributing asylum seekers and refugees, which the Commission suggested as part of the planned reform of the Dublin Regulation (Nielsen 2016). The proposed distribution key system is to be activated whenever a Member State faces a disproportionate number of asylum applications, i.e. more than 150 percent of its capacity. It shall reflect the relative size, wealth and absorption capacities of Member States and shall be monitored by the EASO with the help of a computer. Member States refusing to accept asylum seekers shall have to pay a €250,000 “solidarity contribution” to the hosting Member State. The computerized reallocation is to depoliticize EU decisions on asylum. It would break with the core rule of the Dublin regime established in 1990 that the Member State through which asylum seekers and refugees first entered the EU have to handle their applications on behalf of all other Member States and have to accept those migrants that others forcibly returned to them. If the so-called Dublin III Regulation is amended by a new regulation, national parliaments would not even have to give their consent (European Parliament/European Council 2013). At the time of writing, it is highly questionable, however, whether the Council will adopt the Commission’s formal proposal for the supranational centralization of the Common Asylum System, even if only a qualified majority is necessary. Slovakia and Hungary already filed court cases against temporary reallocation quota. An automatic reallocation mechanism would fly right into the face of Hungarian Prime Minister Orban and his referendum, where he plans to ask Hungarians whether they “want the EU to be able, without the consent of the Parliament, to prescribe the mandatory settlement of non-Hungarian citizens into Hungary?” (Zalan 2016c).

In sum, the migration flows have seen an even more intensified, one-sided politicization than the Euro crisis where populist forces in the Member States, at times joining forces, appeal to illiberal, nationalist, and exclusionary ideas of Europe. By justifying national unilateralism as a response to the absence of a joint European approach, Germany, Austria, and the V4 have so far reached exactly the opposite or so it seems.

4. Stuck in Postfunctionalist Governance: A Plea for Transnationalized Cosmopolitanism

Even those who see crises as “the natural ways of development for the EU” (Agh 2014: 5), acknowledge that the most recent series of crises has attained a new quality since it may challenge the very foundations of the project of European Integration. Unlike in the past, muddling through, experimenting with new modes of governance, or extending the mix of supranational centralization and intergovernmental coordination in the shadow of supranational hierarchy do not provide the necessary escape from the EU’s failure to manage the crises Europe has been facing.

I have argued that the governance crisis of the EU is not caused by the weakness of the “Community of Europeans” (Risse 2010) or the inability of Europeans to show enough “solidarity among strangers” (Habermas 2006) when it comes to redistribution. Nor is it the growing politicization of the EU and European integration per se. The failure to adopt and implement common European solutions to the crises is rooted in the political controversies over who should bear what costs, which are driven by populist politicians that advocate an illiberal, nationalist Europe, which is exclusionary and anti-Islam. Their growing electoral success not only impedes national governments from agreeing on workable policies at the EU level but also undermines their compliance with already adopted EU laws and agreements. The failure to come up with common European solutions further fuels Euro-nationalist populism. This is the bad news. The good news is that there is a way out of this vicious circle. The lesson of the Euro crisis is that trying to depoliticize EU redistributive issues and silencing public debates by isolating EU decisions from public scrutiny is not only futile but counter-productive. What the EU needs instead is not necessarily more transnationalized politicization. Other Europeans are already present in national public spheres “as both speakers and audiences” (Risse 2014: 1211). They also use similar common European frames and claims across borders (Risse 2014; cf. Risse 2015a). The issue is rather that populist politicians, such as Geert Wilders, Marine Le Pen, Victor Orban, or Jarosław Kaczyński with their illiberal, nationalist ideas of Europe have dominated the transnational politicization of the EU and its crises policies. Liberal voices, which represent the opposite pole and appeal to the Europeanized national identities invoking solidarity, liberty, and humanity to mobilize support for the institutionalization of redistribution at the EU level, have been far weaker, both among governments and societal actors.

National public spheres are sufficiently Europeanized to allow for transnational debates of the future of the EU and European integration (Risse 2015a). Students of politicization have recommended to focus these debates on policy rather than constitutional and constitutive issues. Europeans should argue over what kind of policies they want from the EU, rather than over who they are, who belongs to them, or how much power the EU should have (Risse 2015a; Copsy 2015). Substantive policy issues are also easier to square with the more traditional socio-economic cleavages in the Member States (left-right) that are orthogonal to the cosmopolitan-nationalist cleavage (Kriesi et al. 2008; Risse 2010). However, constitutive and constitutional issues have become politicized (Statham/Trenz 2014; Grande/Kriesi 2014) and are here to stay. Attempts to ignore or reframe them as policy issues are not only likely to be futile but will fuel Euroskepticism. Moreover, redistribution is not only about policy; it is about who we are and who belongs to us. I would therefore argue that we need to strengthen cosmopolitanism as the opposite pole to nationalism in the polarized contestation of Europe (for a similar argument see Grande/Kriesi 2014). The upgrading of the common European interest and the scaling up of solidarity among Europeans requires state and civil society actors that invoke liberal, inclusionary frames to mobilize support among the majority of Europeans with Europeanized identities. Inclusionary and redistributive policies require the transfer of more political authority to the EU level. However, rather than focusing on supranational centralization and supranational decision-making, EU redistributive policy-making should rely on intergovernmental coordination in not too strong a shadow of supranational hierarchy; the EU can set minimum standards and goals which should be binding but leave the Member States sufficient discretion in exercising their political authority for economic and migration policy (for a similar argument see Nicolaidis/Watson 2016). This governance mix has worked for policy adoption in the past – the issue is implementation and compliance, which can only be assured by more political and electoral accountability, not less. An EU-framework for redistribution requires the involvement of national parliaments since the European Parliament alone is unlikely to have sufficient democratic legitimacy to generate social acceptance of EU redistributive policy among Europeans. The EU has to start relying on the social acceptance of Europeans in the Member States to ensure compliance, rather than granting more supranational enforcement powers to the Commission, the European Court of Justice, the ECB, or newly created supranational bodies, such as a European Border and Coast Guard or a European Union Agency of Asylum.

Finally, EU and national decision-makers should stop accommodating national governments and parties that appeal to illiberal, nationalist ideas of Europe as a fortress against globalization and Islam in referenda or electoral campaigns on membership, the allocation of political authority between the EU and the national level, or redistributive issues. If this means “core Europe,” (CDU/CSU 1994) so be it. More likely, however, we should see more differentiated integration (Schimmelfennig/Winzen 2014). Rather than excluding them altogether, Member States that prefer unilateralism over cooperation on and compliance with EU policies and institutions should be given the opportunity to exit parts of the EU, e.g. Schengen or the Euro. This might render the EU more complex but it will certainly not be its ultimate demise. On the contrary, putting a price-tag on non-cooperation and non-compliance would help unite “integrationist,” “protectionist” and “minimalist” Member States in the “Europeanist camp” (Kriesi 2016) behind solidarity, liberty, and humanity, which have made European integration the most successful peace project in history.

References

- Àgh, Attila 2014: Decline of Democracy in East-Central Europe: The Last Decade as the Lost Decade in Democratization, in: Journal of Comparative Politics 7/2, 4-33.
- Bayoumi, Tamim/Eichengreen, Barry 1993: Shocking Aspects of European Monetary Unification, in: Torres, Francisco/Giavazzi, Francesco (eds): Adjustment and growth in the European Monetary Union, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 193-235.
- Bickerton, Christopher J./Hodson, Dermot/Puetter, Uwe 2014: The New Intergovernmentalism: European Integration in the Post-Maastricht Era, in: JCMS: Journal of Common Market Studies 53/4, 703-722.
- Bohle, Dorothee/Greskovits, Bela 2012: Capitalist Diversity on Europe's Periphery, Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Börzel, Tanja A. 2010: European Governance - Negotiation and Competition in the Shadow of Hierarchy, in: JCMS: Journal of Common Market Studies 48/2, 191-219.
- Börzel, Tanja A. 2012: The European Union - A Unique Governance Mix?, in: Levi-Faur, David (ed.): Oxford Handbook of Governance, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 613-627.
- Bundesministerium für Inneres der Republik Österreich 2016: „Managing Migration Together“: Declaration, 24 February, Vienna, in: <https://www.bmeia.gv.at/das-ministerium/presse/aussendungen/2016/02/managing-migration-together/>; 28 June 2016.
- CDU/CSU Fraktion im Deutschen Bundestag 1994: Überlegungen zur europäischen Politik, 1 September, in: <https://www.cducsu.de/upload/schaeublelamers94.pdf>; 21 July 2016.
- Chalmers, Damian/Jachtenfuchs, Markus/Joerges, Christian (eds) 2016a: The End of the Eurocrats Dream. Adjusting to European Diversity, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Chalmers, Damian/Jachtenfuchs, Markus/Joerges, Christian 2016b: The Retransformation of Europe, in: Chalmers, Damian/Jachtenfuchs, Markus/Joerges, Christian (eds): The End of the Eurocrats Dream. Adjusting to European Diversity, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1-28.
- Chang, Michele 2016: The (Ever) Incomplete Story of Economic and Monetary Union, in: Journal of Contemporary European Research 12/1, 487-501.
- Checkel, Jeffrey T./Katzenstein, Peter J. (eds) 2009: European Identity, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Coen, David/Héritier, Adrienne (eds) 2006: Refining Regulatory Regimes in Europe: The Creation and Correction of Markets, Cheltenham: Edward Elgar.
- Coen, David/Thatcher, Mark 2008: Network Governance and Multi-level Delegation: European Networks of Regulatory Agencies, in: Journal of Public Policy 28/1, 49-71.
- Copsey, Nathaniel 2015: Rethinking the European Union, Basingstoke: Palgrave.
- Council of the European Union 2015a: Council Decision (CFSP) 2015/778 on a European Union military operation in the Southern Central Mediterranean (EUNAVFOR MED), OJ L 122/31, 18 May.
- Council of the European Union 2015b: Council Decision [...] establishing provisional measures in the area of international protection for the benefit of Italy and Greece, OJ L 248, 24.9.2015, 80-94, 2015/1601, 22 September.
- de Rynk, Stefaan 2016: Banking on a Union: The Politics of Changing Eurozone Banking Supervision, in: Journal of European Public Policy 23/1, 119-135.
- De Wilde, Pieter/Leupold, Anna/Schmidtke, Henning 2016: Introduction: The Differentiated Politicisation of European Governance, in: West European Politics 39/1, 3-22.
- Dinan, Desmond 2016: Governance and Institutions: A More Political Commission, in: JCMS Annual Review of the European Union 2015 54/S1, 101-116.

- Eberlein, Burkard/Grande, Edgar* 2005: Reconstituting Political Authority in Europe: Transnational Regulatory Networks and the Informalization of Governance in the European Union, in: Grande, Edgar/Pauly, Louis W. (eds): Complex Sovereignty: On the Reconstitution of Political Authority in the 21st Century, Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 146-167.
- European Commission* 2014: Agreement Establishing the European Union Regional Trust Fund in Response to the Syrian Crisis, “The Madad Fund”, and Its Internal Rules, between the Directorate General for Development Cooperation of the Italian Ministry of Foreign Affairs and International Cooperation referred to as “the Donor” and the European Commission on behalf of the European Union, signed on 15 December 2014.
- European Commission* 2015a: Annex (4) to the Communication from the Commission to the European Parliament, the European Council and the Council Managing the refugee crisis: State of Play of the Implementation of the Priority Actions under the European Agenda on Migration, COM(2015) 510 final, 14 October.
- European Commission* 2015b: Annex (5) to the Communication from the Commission to the European Parliament, the European Council and the Council Managing the refugee crisis: State of Play of the Implementation of the Priority Actions under the European Agenda on Migration, COM(2015) 510 final, 14 October.
- European Commission* 2015c: Communication from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council: Progress Report on the Implementation of hotspots in Greece, COM(2015) 678 final, 15 December.
- European Commission* 2015d: Communication from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council: Progress Report on the Implementation of the hotspots in Italy, COM(2015) 679 final, 15 December.
- European Commission* 2015e: Draft Amending Budget No 7 to the General Budget 2015: Managing the refugee crisis: immediate budgetary measures under the European Agenda on Migration, COM(2015) 485 final, 30 September.
- European Commission* 2015f: A European Agenda on Migration: A European Union Emergency Trust Fund for Africa, in: http://ec.europa.eu/dgs/home-affairs/what-we-do/policies/european-agenda-migration/background-information/docs/2_factsheet_emergency_trust_fund_africa_en.pdf; 1 May 2016.
- European Commission* 2015g: European Commission - Fact Sheet: European Agenda on Migration: Securing Europe’s External Borders, MEMO/15/6332, Strasbourg, 15 December.
- European Commission* 2015h: Managing the Refugee Crisis: EU-Turkey Joint Action Plan: Implementation Report, in: http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_IP-16-268_en.htmhttp://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_IP-16-268_en.htm; 1 May 2016.
- European Commission* 2015i: Securing Europe’s External Borders: A European Border and Coast Guard, in: http://europa.eu/rapid/press-release_MEMO-15-6332_en.htm; 1 May 2016.
- European Commission* 2015j: Draft Amending Budget No. 7 to the General Budget 2015. Making the Refugee Crisis: Immediate Budgetary Measures under the European Agenda on Migration, COM(2015) 485 final, in: http://opac.oireachtas.ie/AWDData/Library3/FINdoclaid061015_172233.pdf; 21 July 2016.
- European Commission* 2015k: Leaders’ Meeting on Refugee Flows along the Western Balkans Route – Leaders’ Statement, in: http://ec.europa.eu/news/2015/docs/leader_statement_final.pdf; 28 July 2016.
- European Commission* 2016a: Communication from the Commission to the European Parliament and the Council on the State of Play of Implementation of the Priority Actions under the European Agenda on Migration, COM(2016) 85 final, 10 February.
- European Commission* 2016b: European Semester 2016: Country Reports, in: http://ec.europa.eu/news/2016/02/20160226_en.htm; 1 May 2016.

- European Parliament/European Council* 2013: Regulation No 604/2013 [...] establishing the criteria and mechanisms for determining the Member State responsible for examining an application for international protection lodged in one of the Member States by a third-country national or a stateless person, OJ L 180, 29.6.2013, 604/2013, 26 June.
- European Parliament/European Council* 2014: Regulation (EU) No 516/2014 [...] 16 April 2014 establishing the Asylum, Migration and Integration Fund, amending Council Decision 2008/381/EC and repealing Decisions No 573/2007/EC and No 575/2007/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council and Council Decision 2007/435/EC, OJ L 150/168, 16 April.
- European Parliament/European Council* 2015: Regulation [...] establishing an EU common list of safe countries of origin for the purposes of Directive 2013/32/EU of the European Parliament and of the Council on common procedures for granting and withdrawing international protection, and amending Directive 2013/32/EU, COM(2015) 452 final, 9 September.
- Fabbrini, Federico* 2014: The Euro-crisis and the Courts: Judicial Review and the Political Process in Comparative Perspective, in: Berkeley Journal of International Law 32/1, 64-123.
- Fabbrini, Sergio* 2013: Intergovernmentalism and its Limits: Assessing the European Union's Answer to the Euro Crisis, in: Comparative Political Studies 46/9, 1003-1029.
- Fasone, Cristina* 2013: European Economic Governance and Parliamentary Representation. What Place for the European Parliament?, in: European Law Journal 20/2, 164-185.
- Featherstone, Kevin* 2016: Conditionality, Democracy and Institutional Weakness: the Euro-crisis Trilemma, in: JCMS Annual Review of the European Union in 2015 54/S1, 48-64.
- Fligstein, Neil* 2009: Who Are the Europeans and How Does This Matter for Politics?, in: Checkel, Jeffrey T./ Katzenstein, Peter J. (eds): European Identity, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 132-166.
- Follesdal, Andreas* 2015: Democracy, Identity, and European Public Spheres, in: Risse, Thomas (ed.), European Public Spheres: Politics is Back, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 247-262.
- Genschel, Philipp/Jachtenfuchs, Markus* 2016a: Conflict-minimising Integration: How the EU Achieves Massive Integration Despite Massive Protest, in: Chalmers, Damian/Jachtenfuchs, Markus/Joerges, Christian (eds): The End of the Eurocrats' Dream. Adjusting to European Diversity, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 166-189.
- Genschel, Philipp/Jachtenfuchs, Markus* 2016b: More Integration, Less Federation: The European Integration of Core State Powers, in: Journal of European Public Policy 23/1, 42-59.
- George, Stephen/Bache, Ian* 2001: Politics in the European Union, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Grande, Edgar/Kriesi, Hanspeter* 2014: The Restructuring of Political Conflict in Europe and the Politicization of European Integration, in: Risse, Thomas (ed.): European Public Spheres. Politics Is Back, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 190-223.
- Grande, Edgar/Kriesi, Hanspeter* 2016: Conclusions: The Postfunctionalists Were (Almost) Right, in: Hutter, Swen/Grande, Edgar/Kriesi, Hanspeter (eds): Politicising Europe: Integration and Mass Politics, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 279-300.
- Habermas, Jürgen* 2006: The Divided West, Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Habermas, Jürgen* 2013: Democracy, solidarity and the European crisis, in: Social Europe: The Journal of the European Left 7/2, 4-13.
- Harrison, Sarah/Bruter, Michael* 2015: Media and Identity: The Paradox of Legitimacy and the Making of European Citizens, in: Risse, Thomas (ed.): European Public Spheres: Politics is Back, Cambridge: Cambridge University, 165-189.
- Héritier, Adrienne* 1999: Policy-Making and Diversity in Europe. Escape from Deadlock, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Héritier, Adrienne/Lehmkuhl, Dirk* (eds) 2008: The Shadow of Hierarchy and New Modes of Governance, Special Issue Journal of Public Policy 28/1, 1-17.

- Hix, Simon* 2015: Democratizing a Macroeconomic Union in Europe, in: Cramme, Olaf/Hobolt, Sara B. (eds): Democratic Politics in a European Union under Stress, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 180-198.
- Hodson, Dermot* 2016: Eurozone Governance: From the Greek Drama of 2015 to the Five Presidents' Report, in: JCMS Annual Review of the European Union 2015 54/S1, 150-166.
- Hodson, Dermot/Maher, Imelda* 2001: The Open Method as a New Mode of Governance: The Case of Soft Economic Policy Co-ordination, in: JCMS: Journal of Common Market Studies 39/4, 719-746.
- Hooghe, Liesbet* (ed.) 1996: Cohesion Policy and European Integration: Building Multi-Level Governance, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Hooghe, Liesbet/Marks, Gary* 2009: A Postfunctionalist Theory of European Integration: From Permissive Consensus to Constraining Dissensus, in: British Journal of Political Science 39/1, 1-23.
- Howarth, David/Quaglia, Lucia* 2013: Banking Union as Holy Grail: Rebuilding the Single Market in Financial Services, Stabilizing Europe's Banks and "Completing" Economic and Monetary Union, in: The JCMS Annual Review of the European Union in 2012 49/S1, 119-141.
- Joerges, Christian* 2016: Integration Through Law and the Crisis of Law in Europe's Emergency, in: Chalmers, Damian/Jachtenfuchs, Markus/Joerges, Christian (eds): The End of the Eurocrats' Dream. Adjusting to European Diversity, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 299-338.
- Junge, Dirk/König, Thomas/Luig, Bernd* 2015: Legislative Gridlock and Bureaucratic Politics in the European Union, in: British Journal of Political Science 45/4, 777-797.
- König, Thomas/Dannwolf, Tanja/Luetgert, Brooke* 2012: EU Legislative Activities and Domestic Politics, in: Brouard, Sylvain/Costa, Olivier/König, Thomas (eds): The Europeanization of Domestic Legislatures. The Empirical Implications of Delor's Myth in Nine Countries, New York, NY: Springer, 21-37.
- Kriesi, Hanspeter* 2016: The Politicization of European Integration, in: JCMS Annual Review of the European Union 2015 54/S1, 32-47.
- Kriesi, Hanspeter/Grande, Edgar/Lachat, Romain/Dolezal, Martin/Bornschier, Simon/Frey, Timotheos* 2008: West European Politics in the Age of Globalization, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Kuhn, Theresa/Stoeckel, Florian* 2014: When European Integration Becomes Costly: The Euro Crisis as a Test of Public Support for European Economic Governance, in: Journal of European Public Policy 21/4, 624-641.
- Lavenex, Sandra* 2007: Mutual Recognition and the Monopoly of Force: Limits of the Single Market Analogy, in: Journal of European Public Policy 14/5, 762-779.
- Levi-Faur, David* 1999: The Governance of Competition: The Interplay of Technology, Economics, and Politics in European Union Electricity and Telecom Regimes, in: Journal of Public Policy 19/2, 175-207.
- Mair, Peter* 2007: Political Opposition and the European Union, in: Government and Opposition 42/1, 1-17.
- Majone, Giandomenico* 1994: The Rise of the Regulatory State in Europe, in: West European Politics 17/3, 77-101.
- Majone, Giandomenico* 2005: Dilemmas of European Integration: The Ambiguities and Pitfalls of Integration by Stealth, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Majone, Giandomenico* 2014: Rethinking the Union of Europe Post-Crisis: Has Integration Gone Too Far?, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Molina, Óscar/Rhodes, Martin* 2008: The Political Economy of Adjustment in Mixed Market Economies: A Study of Spain and Italy, in: Hancké, Bob/Rhodes, Martin/Thatcher, Martin (eds): Beyond Varieties of Capitalism: Conflict, Contradiction and Complementarities in the European Economy, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 223-252.
- Monar, Jörg* 2016: Justice and Home Affairs, in: JCMS Annual Review of the European Union 2015 54/S1, 134-149.

- Nicolaidis, Kalypso/Watson, Max* 2016: Sharing the Eurocrats' Dream. A Democratic Approach to EMU Governance in the Post-crisis Era, in: Chalmers, Damian/Jachtenfuchs, Markus/Joerges, Christian (eds): The End of the Eurocrats' Dream. Adjusting to European Diversity, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 50-77.
- Nicolaidis, Kalypso/Shaffer, Gregory* 2005: Transnational Mutual Recognition Regimes: Governance without Global Government, in: Law & Contemporary Problems 68/3-4, 263-318.
- Nielsen, Nikolaj* 2016: Computer to Make EU Asylum Decisions, in: EUobserver, 4 May, <https://euobserver.com/migration/133341>; 21 July 2016.
- Nugent, Neill/Rhinard, Mark* 2016: Is the European Commission Really in Decline?, in: JCMS: Journal of Common Market Studies, online version, <http://onlinelibrary.wiley.com/doi/10.1111/jcms.12358/pdf>; 22 July 2016.
- Polyakova, Alina/Fligstein, Neil* 2016: Is European Integration Causing Europe to Become More Nationalist? Evidence from the 2007-9 Financial Crisis, in: Journal of European Public Policy 23/1, 60-83.
- Puetter, Uwe* 2014: The European Council and the Council. New Intergovernmentalism and Institutional Change, Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Quaglia, Lucia* 2010: Governing Financial Services in the European Union, London: Routledge.
- Risse, Thomas* 2010: A Community of Europeans? Transnational Identities and Public Spheres, Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press.
- Risse, Thomas* 2014: No Demos? Identities and Public Spheres in the Euro Crisis, in: JCMS: Journal of Common Market Studies 52/6, 1207-1215.
- Risse, Thomas* 2015a: European Public Spheres, the Politicization of EU Affairs, and Its Consequences, in: Risse, Thomas (ed.): European Public Spheres. Politics Is Back, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 141-164.
- Risse, Thomas* (ed.) 2015b: European Public Spheres. Politics Is Back, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Savage, James D./Verdun, Amy* 2016: Strengthening the European Commission's Budgetary and Economic Surveillance Capacity since Greece and the Euro Area Crisis: A Study of Five Directorates-General, in: Journal of European Public Policy 23/1, 101-118.
- Scharpf, Fritz W.* 1997: Games real Actors Play. Actor-Centered Institutionalism in Policy Research, Boulder, CO: Westview Press.
- Scharpf, Fritz W.* 2009: Legitimacy in the Multilevel European Polity, in: European Political Science Review 1/2, 173-204.
- Scharpf, Fritz W.* 2015: Political Legitimacy in a Non-optimal Currency Area, in: Cramme, Olaf/Hobolt, Sara B. (eds): Democratic Politics in a European Union under Stress, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 19-47.
- Scharpf, Fritz W.* 2016: The Costs of Non-Disintegration. The Case of EMU, in: Chalmers, Damian/Jachtenfuchs, Markus/Joerges, Christian (eds): The End of the Eurocrats Dream. Adjusting to European Diversity, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 29-49.
- Schimmelfennig, Frank* 2014: European Integration in the Euro Crisis. The Limits of Postfunctionalism, in: Journal of European Integration 36/3, 321-337.
- Schimmelfennig, Frank/Winzen, Thomas* 2014: Instrumental and Constitutional Differentiation in the European Union, in: JCMS: Journal of Common Market Studies 52/2, 354-370.
- Schmidt, Susanne K.* 2007: Mutual Recognition as a New Mode of Governance, in: Journal of European Public Policy, Special Issue 14/5, 667-681.
- Schmidt, Vivien A.* 2006: Democracy in Europe. The EU and National Politics, Oxford: Oxford University Press.

- Statham, Paul/Trenz, Hans-Jorg* 2014: The Politicization of Europe: Contesting the Constitution in the Mass Media, London: Routledge.
- Streeck, Wolfgang/Elsässer, Lea* 2016: Monetary Disunion: The Domestic Politics of Euroland, in: Journal of European Public Policy 23/1, 1-24.
- Sun, Jeanne-Mey/Pelkmans, Jacques* 1995: Regulatory Competition in the Single Market, in: JCMS: Journal of Common Market Studies 33/1, 67-89.
- Thielemann, Eiko R./El-Enany, Nadine* 2010: Refugee Protection as a Collective Action Problem: Is the EU Shirking Its Responsibilities?, in: European Security 19/2, 209-229.
- Tömmel, Ingeborg* 2016: EU Governance of Governance: Political Steering in a Non-Hierarchical Multilevel System, in: Journal of Contemporary European Research 12/1, 406-423.
- Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU)* 2007, signed on 13 December 2007, entered into force on 1 December 2009.
- van Ark, Bart/Chen, Vivian/Colijn, Bert/Jaeger, Kirsten/Overmeer, Wim/Timmer, Marcel* 2013: Recent Changes in Europe's Competitive Landscape and Medium-Term Perspectives: How the Sources of Demand and Supply Are Shaping Up, in: European Economy Economic Papers 485, April 2013, Brussels: European Commission.
- Wilson, James Q.* 1980: The Politics of Regulation, in: Wilson, James Q. (ed.): The Politics of Regulation, New York, NY: Basic Books, 357-394.
- Wodak, Ruth* 2015: The Politics of Fear. What Right-Wing Populist Discourses Mean, London: Sage.
- Zalan, Eszter* 2016a: EU Unveils €700m Refugee Fund with Greece in Mind, in: EUobserver, 2 March, <https://euobserver.com/migration/132529>; 21 July 2016.
- Zalan, Eszter* 2016b: Eastern EU States Want Migration 'Plan B', in: EUobserver, 16 February, <https://euobserver.com/migration/132277>; 21 July 2016.
- Zalan, Eszter* 2016c: Hungary to Hold Referendum on EU Migration Plan, in: EUobserver, 24 February, <https://euobserver.com/political/132439>; 21 July 2016.
- Zürn, Michael* 2012: The Politicization of World Politics and Its Effects. Eight Propositions, in: European Political Science Review 61/1, 47-71.

The Kolleg-Forschergruppe - Encouraging Academic Exchange and Intensive Research

The Kolleg-Forschergruppe (KFG) is a funding program launched by the German Research Foundation (Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft - DFG) in 2008. As a Research College, it is intended to provide a scientifically stimulating environment for innovative research within a small group of senior and junior researchers.

The Kolleg-Forschergruppe „The Transformative Power of Europe“ investigates how ideas spread across time and space. During its first phase of research, from 2008-2012, the KFG studied the diffusion of policy ideas and institutions within the European Union (EU), its candidates and neighborhood. During the second phase, from 2012-2016, the KFG realigns its focus of interest on the diffusion of ideas, policies, and institutions beyond Europe (comparative regionalism) and the analysis of the EU at the receiving end of external influences. Its two main research areas are:

- The EU and Regional Institutions in Latin America, Africa, the Middle East and Asia
- Europe and the EU and Recipients of Diffusion

KFG The
Transformative
Power of Europe

