A particular feature of medieval Islamic civilisation was its wide horizons. The Muslims fell heir not only to the Graeco-Roman world of the Mediterranean, but also to that of the ancient Near East, to the empires of Assyria, Babylon and the Persians; and beyond that, they were in frequent contact with India and China to the east and with black Africa to the south. This intellectual openness can be sensed in many interrelated fields of Muslim thought, and it impacted powerfully on trade and on the networks that made it possible. Books in this series reflect this openness and cover a wide range of topics, periods and geographical areas.

Acknowledgements

As always, there are more people to thank than there is room for on these pages, but a few names should be singled out. Karima Benaicha (Al-Furqan Foundation, London), Abdul Aati al-Sharqawi (ILM, Cairo) and Philipp Roe (Chester Beatty Library) generously helped with gaining access to manuscript reproductions. Said Aljoumani has been a wonderful companion and was always there to discuss manuscript notes. Iman Zayat and Stephanie Luescher helped to bring the manuscript and illustrations into shape. Suzanne Ruggi once again copy-edited the book manuscript. Benedikt Reier, Boris Liebreiz and Garrett Davidson sent those emails with clues that led me to identify yet another manuscript. Rania Abdellatif got hold of the titles published in Syria. Tamer el-Leithy invited me to the History Seminar at Johns Hopkins University, a uniquely helpful meeting for discussing what I then believed would be a chapter for this book. Reading and discussing the work of PhD students, while writing this book especially Christopher Bahl, Mohamad El-Merheb and Daisy Livingston, has been a constant inspiration. I can only express my heartfelt gratitude to all those colleagues who were willing to discuss this project and who have responded to my queries. This goes especially for the participants in the workshops and conferences where I presented aspects of this work, especially those in London, Munich, Cairo, Paris, Istanbul, Rabat, Jena, Beirut, Princeton, Hamburg and Leeds.

Writing a book requires extended periods of research leave and I have to thank three institutions who enabled this project: a fellowship by the British Academy for 2014/15 allowed me to begin; a three-month stay as fellow at the Annemarie-Schimmel-Kolleg in Bonn in 2015 provided me with the tranquil environment needed to take it further; and a sabbatical granted by my home institution Freie Universität Berlin in 2018 gave me much-needed time to finish the draft. As with my previous books, my thanks to these institutions is particularly sincere as they were willing to support a stand-alone project at a time when funding is increasingly focused on large-scale research groups. My particular gratitude goes to the Freie Universität Berlin for providing funds to publish this book as open access.

I would also like to thank the two anonymous reviewers at Edinburgh University Press for their constructive comments, especially on how to present the material. The different members of staff at Edinburgh University Press who were involved in this project, in particular Nicola Ramsey, Kirsty Woods and Eddie Clark, once again greatly contributed to bringing this work to publication.

Introduction

This is the story of a man and his books in late medieval Damascus. The story will take us up the slopes of Mount Qāsyūn, to the west of the walls of the Old City, and into the home of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī (d. 909/1503).¹ Born in c. 840/1437, he was a scholar of some, but in no way outstanding, local importance: even though he wrote several hundred ‘books’ (many were rather booklets), his contemporaries and successive generations hardly studied them. The vast majority of his books have not even once been copied in the course of the last 500 years. While we normally hunt for the autograph of a work, in his case it is the exact opposite: the autograph is the default mode in which we encounter his books. Yet, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī left us something that is exceedingly rare for the medieval and early modern Arabic lands, namely a substantial document on book ownership. This is a catalogue (fihris) of the books he endowed in his late fifties for his own benefit and that of his offspring – books that ultimately ended up in the library of a madrasa, an institution of higher learning. The present study is centred on this shabby-looking book list of fifty-eight folia, which sits today on the shelves of the National al-Asad Library in Damascus. Here, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī itemised several hundred books with almost 3,000 titles (most of the books he owned contained numerous booklets that had once been stand-alone objects).² His fihrist is thus, in terms of titles, the largest extant documentary book list that has come down to us for the pre-Ottoman Arabic lands.

¹ This book uses ‘Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’, in contrast to ‘Ibn al-Mibrad’ as he is sometimes referred to in scholarship (e.g. Miura, Dynamism in the Urban Society of Damascus and Ibn al-Mibrad [Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī], Iḥāf al-nubalā’). This divide in naming practices is deplorable and has led to confusion. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī almost without exception referred to himself with this name.

² MS Damascus, National al-Asad Library 3190. After much hesitation, in light of the current situation in Syria, I opted for its current name National al-Asad Library in order to avoid further confusion. This library has repeatedly changed its name in the course of the last 130 years from Public Library (al-Maktaba al-‘umūmiya), to the National Zāhiriya Library (Dār al-kutub

This fihrist allows us to ease the door open to see the cultural practices of book production, book ownership and book transmission in late medieval Damascus from a new angle. The act of endowing one's books had been a well-established practice for centuries and there is nothing unusual at all about it. That this man and his books are nevertheless worthy of a book-length study is not because he or his books would be of outstanding importance or would have paradigmatic value: there were none of the great texts of Arabic/Islamic philosophy, theology or medicine on his shelves. In addition, Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's book collection no longer exists. The library in which his books were sitting for some 400 years was dissolved in the late nineteenth century and his case is thus one of the many medieval and early modern 'ghost' libraries that are not extant. Yet, Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's book endowment deserves to be discussed in such detail because his case – in contrast to so many other medieval book endowments – is surrounded by an outstandingly dense documentation that goes well beyond the fihrist. This dense documentation provides a unique insight into the main question driving this book: what was the social and cultural significance of owning and endowing books in the late medieval period?

That Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's endowment can be studied in such detail to tackle this question is very much down to him being an obsessive writer. He loved to put anything and everything down on paper: he compiled over 800 works (the exact number is not known and settling this would require another book); he wrote not one but several auto-bibliographies; he left thousands of notes of all sorts in the books he owned; he loved to organise his daily life in lists; and he wrote the catalogue, fihrist, of the books he endowed. Most importantly, when working on this book I soon found that many of the actual manuscripts that he had once owned and subsequently endowed in the 'Umarīya Madrasa can be identified in modern-day libraries around al-abliya al-zāhiriya), to the National al-Asad Library (Maktabat al-asad al-waṭaniya). These changes in names were accompanied by changes in the classmark system. Regrettably, modern authors often refer to manuscripts with the old Zāhiriya classmarks, adding to the difficulty in retrieving the manuscript in question. In order not to add a further element to this confusion, this book simply uses the current official name irrespective of any other considerations.

the world. These manuscripts brought the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī endowment to life in several ways: their materiality and their physical form tell a much richer story than that of the fihrist alone (for a start, it is striking how shabby and small many of these manuscripts are); the notes they carry add crucial texture to what this collection meant to him in practice (such as him noting that one of his sons had fallen asleep while he was reading the book to him); and the legal documents he bound into them (scraps of paper obviously never mentioned in the fihrist) show that he used his books as quasi-archival depositories that give unique insights into how he earned his daily bread and sustained his sprawling household.

That Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī produced such an extraordinary documentation was the initial reason for writing this book. Much more striking, however, is that so much of this documentation has survived until today. This is not just down to the chance of document and manuscript survival; it has a social logic that sits at the heart of this book’s argument. On the one hand, so much of his paperwork has survived because it was carefully packaged within the framework of a highly conscious project that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was conducting: a project of monumentalising a specific moment from the past of his city, his quarter, his family and his scholarly community via his carefully curated collection of books. Moreover, it is not the case that so much of his endowment survived because these books were subsequently lovingly preserved and valued as cultural artefacts. On the contrary, his books had an outstandingly stable trajectory because, as will have become clear by the end of this book, they had already fallen out of scholarly fashion when he endowed and thus monumentalised them – they had become so marginal that people no longer cared much about them. They have survived in such large numbers because readers did not wear out their pages and bindings with constant use, because inattentive users did not tear off their title pages when they took them from the book stacks on the shelves, because readers who longed to own them did not steal them and because traders did not resell them expecting high margins. This all changed in the late nineteenth century when Middle Eastern and European actors started to ascribe a new cultural value to these books (that increasingly became ‘manuscripts’) and took them out of the ‘Umarīya Madrasa on Mount Qāsyūn where they had rested for some 400 years. In consequence, we find manuscripts from the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī endowment today in libraries around the world, even though – on account of their relatively late mobilisation compared to other corpora of Arabic manuscripts – most of them have stayed in Damascus.

As we have such a rich documentation, this book operates on two levels. Firstly, it has a merely descriptive purpose, most importantly editing the fibrists, identifying its titles and matching these titles with the actual extant manuscript. This is what Chapters 5 and 6 are about. Secondly, it goes beyond this descriptive level and builds up over the course of Chapters 1 to 4 the central argument that the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī endowment in its textual configuration and its material form was an attempt to monumentalise a bygone era of scholarly practices, namely ‘post-canonical ḥadīth transmission’.³ The post-canonical approach of dealing with the sayings and deeds attributed to Prophet Muḥammad had had its heyday in the previous three centuries and was particularly popular within the Ḥanbali community on the slopes of Mount Qāsyūn. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was highly invested in this line of scholarship in terms of the religious significance he ascribed to it, in terms of its importance for his own scholarly profile and in terms of the central position it had held for members of his family, for those he considered to be his scholarly ancestors and for his home turf, the Ṣālīḥīya Quarter.⁴

This process of monumentalisation was reflected in the endowment as a whole on various levels, not least because more than half of its titles were booklets concerned with ḥadīth. It is also reflected in the level of the individual book via the process of ‘majmū‘isation’, that is binding previously independent codicological units (in this case small booklets) into one large book (majmū‘). As we will see, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī embarked on a massive binding project, creating along the way hundreds of new textual configurations in new material forms, each of them a monument in its own right. Thus the use of the term ‘monumentalisation’ refers in the following to two distinct, but closely linked, processes and outcomes: on the one hand the overall corpus of the books that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī endowed and on the other hand, on a more granular level, to the individual books that he created to build up his endowment.

⁴ The Ṣālīḥīya will be called throughout this book a ‘quarter’, rather than an independent ‘town’. In this I follow the seminal book on the Ṣālīḥīya by Miura, Dynamism in the Urban Society of Damascus. Yet, it is evident that it also was at times a rather independent urban entity in the course of its history.

Research Context and Approach

In terms of its scholarly peer group, this book is first and foremost in conversation with other studies on the history of libraries and book collections in the Arabic Middle East. Library and book history has been part and parcel of the field of Middle Eastern history/Islamic Studies since its inception as a modern discipline.⁵ In a philologically inclined field it comes as no surprise that the early pioneer Etienne Quatremère had published the substantial Mémoire sur le goût de livres chez les orientaux as early as the 1830s.⁶ This piece was to prove paradigmatic for research into libraries and book collections in the field with its focus on narrative sources (such as chronicles) and normative sources (such as adab works for scholars). This narrative/normative-sources-approach has remained an important feature of the field and has contributed some important works, among them Houari Touati's L'Armoire à sagesse and Doris Behrens-Abouseif's The Book in Mamluk Egypt and Syria.⁷

However, studying what authors had to say about books can obviously be only one piece in the jigsaw of reconstructing what books people owned, what books were held in collections and what significance people ascribed to them. In consequence, individual scholars have repeatedly tried out other approaches to write the history of books and libraries, especially by identifying alternative sources. This has developed over the past decade into a full-blown reorientation of the field as part of the wider changes in writing the history of the medieval Middle East that can by now be called a veritable 'documentary turn'. Recent scholarship, especially for the early Islamic period, has revised the received wisdom that hardly any documentary sources are available for writing the region's history. The 2013 book by Petra Sijpesteijn, for instance, has fundamentally rewritten how the new Muslim elites shaped administration in late antique Egypt.⁸ This documentary reorientation has brought to light numerous large corpora of documents that scholarship acting within the narrative/normative-sources-approach paradigm had simply either not noted or had considered to be of little interest. One of the most striking examples of this are the thousands of Arabic administrative documents, primarily from the eleventh to the thirteenth centuries, that are part of the Cairo Genizah collection. It required the dedicated work of Marina Rustow and others to bring this rich material to the attention of the field.⁹ In the same vein, since the 1970s, scholarship has been aware of the hundreds of legal documents from the Ḥaram al-sharīf in Jerusalem, primarily from the fourteenth century, but they have only recently started to make a real impact on writing the region's history.¹⁰ Finally, the documentary corpora held in Christian contexts are increasingly emerging as crucial points of reference.¹¹

In line with this broader development, we see in the course of the second half of the twentieth century in the field of book and library history the gradual emergence of two additional approaches that both centre on the manuscript itself: the 'corpus-approach' and the 'documentary-approach'. The corpus-approach was pioneered in the 1960s by the ground-breaking book of Youssef Eche, Les bibliothèques arabes publiques et semipubliques. In this book, drawing on his intimate knowledge of manuscripts in the Syrian National Library, at this point held in the Zāhiriya building, he took the first steps to reconstruct the history of an Ayyubid/early Mamluk collection, the library housed in the Damascene Ḍiyā'īya Madrasa/Dār al-Ḥadīth.¹² This splendid book also showed to what extent working with a multitude of the manuscript notes that are so characteristic of Arabic manuscript cultures (those registering ownership, lending, transmission, reading and so on) allows the development of a collection to be traced.¹³

It has taken a very long time for the field to fully grasp the potential of Eche's work, but since the 2010s it has had a series of seminal successors.

⁸ Sijpesteijn, Shaping a Muslim State.

⁹ Rustow, The Lost Archive.

¹⁰ Müller, Der Kadi und seine Zeugen.

¹¹ The best example of this trend is still El-Leithy, Coptic Culture.

¹² Eche, Bibliothèques arabes publiques et semipubliques.

¹³ On such notes cf. Görke/Hirschler, Manuscript Notes. A very good recent example of the impact manuscript notes have is the survey by Erünsal, Kitap ve Kütüphâne.

These have especially focused on the Ottoman-period collections which, by virtue of temporal proximity, have a much higher probability of being preserved – more or less – in their original form. Two recent examples of this trend are the studies of Berat Açı̇l in 2015 and Boris Liebreuz in 2016.¹⁴ Açı̇l took one of the many historic collections held in the Süleymaniye Library in Istanbul, that of Cârullah Efendi endowed in the early eighteenth century. Even though this collection has some 2,200 volumes, its endower was an obscure figure whose biography can only be reconstructed from the notes on his books. Açı̇l does an ingenious job of reconstructing the profile and the role of a library that would have remained under the radar of any study within the narrative/normative-sources-approach. Liebreuz, in turn, focused on a corpus of manuscripts acquired in 1853 in Damascus by the Prussian consul Johann Gottfried Wetzstein (1815–1905) and held today in Leipzig.¹⁵ This Rifā'īya Library of some 500 volumes was a private library that narrative sources again ignored entirely and the biography of its owner is once more hardly visible from these sources. Its history and role in the cultural life of Ottoman Damascus is only evident from the manuscripts themselves and more importantly from the numerous manuscript notes that Liebreuz wonderfully pieced together. One rare example of the corpus-approach being successfully applied to a medieval library is the ongoing work by Ashirbek Muminov, Sh. Ziyadov and Akram Khabibullaev on the family endowment library of Muḥammad Pārsā (d. 822/1420) from Bukhārā that survived up to the nineteenth century and has since been scattered across the world.¹⁶

This corpus-approach will continue to make crucial contributions to the field; one only has to think of the many historical collections held in the Süleymaniye alone that are still woefully understudied as corpora in their own right. Yet even further afield, work is developing along these lines and the ongoing Saadian Intellectual and Cultural Life project by François Déroche and Nuria Martínez de Castilla is a perfect example of this. This project is based on the collection of Arabic manuscripts in the San Lorenzo de El Escorial Library, which contains the books of the library of Moroccan Sultan

Mūlay Zaydān.¹⁷ Captured in 1612, this corpus still preserves to a large extent the profile of an early modern court library. For the early modern period in South Asia, Christopher Bahl has identified several corpora that provide an insight into library holdings of Arabic texts.¹⁸ The ongoing project of Feras Krimsti on the library of a physician from Aleppo also revolves around rebuilding a library by identifying its manuscript corpus.¹⁹ For the medieval period, the corpus-approach is particularly helpful to shed light on smaller collections, such as that of the scholar Ṣadr al-Dīn Qunavī (d. 673/1274) in Konya studied by Mikâil Bayram.²⁰

The third approach, in addition to the narrative/normative-sources-approach and the corpus-approach, is the documentary-approach, which primarily focuses on documentary evidence on book collections. It has to be stated right away that the borders between this approach and the corpus-approach are very fluid as working with corpora of existing manuscripts, as seen above, has always involved working with manuscript notes that could also be classified as documentary sources.²¹ In that sense the characteristic element of the documentary-approach, as it is understood here, is that it focuses on collections that have been dispersed over the course of the centuries. Its starting point is thus not a corpus of manuscripts, but rather documentation that was written with reference to such vanished collections. Its genesis is very much linked with the wider documentary turn in medieval Middle Eastern history/Islamic Studies as the very first studies, such as those by ‘Abd al-Laṭīf Ibrāhīm, were published in parallel with the academic ‘discovery’ of Mamluk endowment records in the 1960s.²² As we have relatively few other documentary sources, endowment records are still the most important resource for gaining insights into institutional collections.²³

For the Ottoman period the use of documents had been standard practice, well before the documentary turn in the field of medieval history. In consequence, we see here a much wider range of documentary source genres being used to write the history of libraries and book collections. These include, for instance, estate inventories; Nelly Hanna's In Praise of Books on Ottoman Cairo is one of the best examples of what such inventories can contribute to writing cultural history from the perspective of book ownership.²⁴ For the pre-Ottoman period in the Syrian and Egyptian lands, by contrast, only three book-related estate inventories are known, those of the Ḥaram al-sharīf collection in Jerusalem.²⁵ Ulrich Haarmann made the first attempt to discuss this material, yet it still awaits the full attention it deserves.²⁶ In order to understand the wide range of documentary material that has been mobilised for writing the history of libraries and book collections in the Ottoman period, the best example is the oeuvre of Ismail Erünsal. In his enormous set of publications, he has given us a unique insight into the libraries of Istanbul up to the nineteenth century on the basis of various documentary source genres.²⁷

The study of library catalogues, and hence the present book, is part of the documentary-approach and its development in recent decades. The term 'catalogue' is not just the translation of 'fihrist'; there are *fihrist*s that are not catalogues and there are catalogues that are not called *fihrist*s. I understand a 'catalogue' to be a book list that referred to a collection of books in one physical place without having a legal function. The non-legal requirement differentiates catalogues from other book lists such as estate inventories and endowment deeds. The legal function of these latter lists entailed very different notions of what should be included (for instance monetary value) and how they were organised (for instance according to buyers of various lots of books). The 'physical place' requirement is crucial in order to draw a line between catalogues and what could rather be called bibliographies. The classical example of the latter is the famous Fihrist of the tenth-century Baghdadi bookseller Ibn al-Nadīm.²⁸ Obviously this is not a catalogue as we have no indication whatsoever that the books in this list were held in one single collection. Rather this *fihris*t expressed the accumulated knowledge of books gained by an individual over the course of many years in various cities and numerous collections. Moreover, it is debatable to what extent the largest group of medieval Middle Eastern book lists known to date, those from the Cairo Genizah, actually include anything that could be called a catalogue. Those that refer to book collections in institutions are rather inventories and thus again have very different concerns.²⁹

For the pre-Ottoman period the number of known catalogues from the Arabic lands is exceedingly small.³⁰ The oldest extant catalogue is that of a minor teaching institution in early Mamluk Damascus, the Ashrafiya catalogue from the 670s/1270s. Its writer used an ingenious classification system according to alphabet, subject matter and size to deal with over 2,000 books that were on the shelves of this library.³¹ The highly sophisticated system indicates that there was a rich tradition of cataloguing practices of which most examples are lost (or yet to be discovered). The other well-known medieval Arabic specimen is the catalogue-cum-inventory of the mosque library in the North African city of Kairouan from 693/1293–4, which only has 125 titles.³² The final example of a known pre-Ottoman catalogue is the one dealt with in this book, the endowment catalogue by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī.

However, calling Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s *fihris*t a ‘catalogue’ comes with a caveat, as this catalogue, in contrast to the Ashrafiya catalogue, had no practical function; the purpose of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s catalogue was not for users to quickly identify what books were in the library and locate them on the shelves (Chapter 5 has more on its organisation). Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s catalogue has been well known for decades, but it has not been edited and studied in a dedicated book to date.³³ This is despite Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī being ‘rediscovered’ in the course of the twentieth century, especially in the framework of Islamic revivalism. As a Ḥanbali from Damascus who was deeply invested in ḥadīth scholarship, he is being recognised increasingly as a meaningful author whose works are now far more popular than they were during his lifetime or subsequent centuries. In consequence, dozens of his books have been edited (usually based on the unicum autograph) and we have several overviews of his works that also used his fihrist.³⁴ The absence of a fully edited fihrist that takes into account the existing corpus of manuscripts has assigned it a rather marginal place – too marginal for it to be seen as anything more than a factual repository of bibliographical information and also too marginal for it to even be consulted for cross-referencing catalogues, where it could have prevented factual errors.³⁵ That this catalogue has not been subject to a dedicated study made it possible that quite wild numbers circulate as to the number of titles it lists.³⁶

However, to centre this book around this fihrist is not only meant to present factoids, but also to argue that this fihrist had a much wider ambition as part of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s monumentalisation project. This is more than just a list of titles. As Celeste Gianni has argued, catalogues of libraries and book collections have also to be read as literary texts.³⁷ That narrative texts were meant to do something and had a performative character has very much become part of medieval Middle Eastern historiography and has been convincingly shown by work such as that of Gowaart Van Den Bossche for early Mamluk biographies.³⁸ Yet, to read texts with significantly less literary ambition in this way is much less standard in the field and has been slightly side-lined by the enthusiasm of the documentary turn. To read the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī catalogue as a text that was meant to do something, not just represent something, also harks back to my earlier work on Ayyubid and early

Mamluk-period chronicles where I suggested that they were much more than relatively benign political narratives and had much wider literary and social ambitions.³⁹

This book thus follows the documentary turn within book and library history with the twist of taking the catalogue more seriously as a text. However, its main contribution in terms of approach lies elsewhere, namely in its very strong emphasis on material philology.⁴⁰ This is possible because this catalogue has allowed me to do something that had proved impossible for the other main book-related document from pre-Ottoman Syria, the Ashrafiya Library catalogue: to track down a substantial corpus of the books that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī owned in modern-day libraries. The study of the Ashrafiya Library depended almost exclusively on its library catalogue as the actual manuscript could only be identified for less than 10 per cent of its books. For a variety of reasons (for more details on this see Chapter 5), most importantly Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s distinctive hand and his meticulous system of writing transmission notes on his books, the situation has fortunately been quite the opposite for his collection. Almost fifty per cent, forty-seven-and-a-half per cent to be precise, of the titles that had once been on the shelves of his library on Mount Qāsyūn could be identified in libraries in Damascus (National al-Asad Library and al-Majma‘ al-‘ilmī Library), Cairo, Istanbul, Jerusalem, Escorial, Vatican City, Paris, Berlin, London, Gotha, Dublin and Princeton as well as private collections in Beirut/Amman (Shāwīsh) and ‘Unayza (Saudi Arabia, al-Bassām). On the basis of this incomparably richer corpus of identifiable books, this study can lay a particular emphasis on the function and meaning of the book as a physical object in late medieval Syria.

With hundreds of actual manuscripts available from this one late medieval book collection, it is possible to consider the material form, ‘the whole book’, and not just the text. The collection is thus not merely seen as reflecting specific scholarly preoccupations (especially post-canonical ḥadīth transmission), but also as things with specific materialities: features such as size are as important as bindings, binding fragments, configurations of title pages and so on.⁴¹ The Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection is thus studied here as a collection of objects that came into being through a series of processes at a specific time, in a specific place and for a specific purpose.⁴² These physical objects bear traces that are crucial for understanding their dissemination and consumption in the various stages of their life cycle – and it is very important to underline right from the outset that the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection is merely one of these stages. Thus the aim here is, to use the term coined by Igor Kopytoff in his seminal paper, to reconstruct the biographies of things.⁴³ In the field of Middle Eastern book history, material philology has now (implicitly) started to make a discernible impact as is evident from two monographs: Tobias Heinzelmann’s study has shown how careful attention to the texts’ materiality, including traces of users kissing the object, elucidates the usage contexts of largely anonymous texts.⁴⁴ Frederike-Wiebke Daub, in turn, has turned to layout (and this is really the first major study in the field to do so) to understand the usage contexts of a different set of popular literature.⁴⁵ What we have started to do, and what this book is very much about, is thus to, in Paul Love’s words, ‘listen to the manuscript’s story’.⁴⁶

The increasing interest in material philology in book and library studies is also part of similar changes in the wider field of Middle Eastern history. The study of documents is a case in point.⁴⁷ Here we see, for instance, a growing interest in the archive, or rather archival practices. The concerns underlying material philology have driven this new scholarship where the individual document has emerged as the prime site of research. Rather than an exclusive focus on the text, issues such as tears, folding lines, traces of gluing and layout are now coming to the fore.⁴⁸ Once the document becomes more than the text and also a ‘thing’, new questions start to arise and one question that is of particular relevance for this book is that of documentary ‘life cycles’. Even if the text remained the same the physical object might have a vivid and meaningful trajectory after the moment of its production, as forcefully shown by Daisy Livingston.⁴⁹ In the present book, life cycles feature prominently because Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī himself welded new books from small booklets that had come into existence a year, ten years or 300 years earlier. He thus built new textual and material configurations out of very dissimilar texts and materials. What mattered to him was clearly not only preserving the text, but also preserving the traces of the objects’ life cycles: he did not cross out the names of previous owners, the notes on previous endowments, the references to previous lenders and so on. Some of the booklets he bound into his manuscripts no longer even included the original text and contained nothing but transmission notes of a vanished, or ‘ghost’, text. It was precisely these life cycles that mattered to him, as they were what drove his monumentalisation project – itself a crucial new stage in these objects’ life cycles.

The present book thus moves away from focusing on the point of production as the determining point in the life cycle of a manuscript book but, in line with recent scholarship on medieval Europe,⁵⁰ it considers the book as a process that resulted in its continued and constant evolution. In other words, focusing on a manuscript’s entire life cycle allows its changing trajectories and changing meanings to be highlighted. They can depart strikingly from what the text was meant to do and what it was meant to signify at the point of production. This allows the manuscript book to be taken as much more than a way to illuminate the historical context at the point of its production, as it becomes a rich source for later periods as well. Perhaps even more importantly, tracing the social lives and material changes of a manuscript brings into the picture later manuscript users as perhaps even as important as the original author/compiler himself or herself. The authority that the manuscript book was meant to signify thus does not rest with the author alone. A later owner or user of the manuscript, such as Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, becomes an authority in their own right in determining these texts' multifarious significations. Once later users of the manuscript book are recognised as actors in various stages of the life cycle, the physical traces they left in the books in terms of manuscript notes, annotations, repairs, binding in their personal paperwork and so on become more than just 'dirt', as William Sherman observed when discussing modern attitudes to such usage traces in Renaissance books.⁵¹

⁴⁹ For the concept of life cycles for the archival context, see in particular Livingston, Managing Paperwork.

Many of the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī books are strange and unwieldy creatures. They are full of material that has (at first glance) no direct link to the main texts in the book. A modern-day reader might feel they have fallen through a rabbit hole when turning the pages. At first, we see what one would expect: relatively well-organised Arabic-Islamic scholarly texts. Yet, we suddenly come across an estate inventory turned by ninety degrees. Around the corner lurks an upside-down parchment fragment of a Greek liturgical text. The reader might have to wade through pages and pages of primary, secondary and tertiary title pages (more on these in Chapter 3) before reaching the main text. Further on sits a register of books Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī lent to friends and family. Next is a parchment fragment of the Book of Daniel in Georgian. Finally, we stumble across pieces that have been lovingly cut from a sale deed of land from fourteenth-century Damascus. As we will see in the following chapters, this stuff matters and these spolia, as I understand them, make many of his monuments highly intricate material constructions. One of the consequences of the material complexity of these books is that Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's own notes on reading, ownership and scholarly transmission are not only relevant for their content, but also for where he placed them. Even his notes can thus not be properly understood as text alone, but have to be understood in relation to their position within the overall shape of the book.

In order to make sense of these unwieldy creatures, two key concepts will be used in Chapter 3. Firstly, 'reuse' is employed in order to stress that the integration of old fragments (be they deeds or liturgical fragments from other scripts) could very well be a meaningful act and more than just opportunistic 'recycling'. This has been well established for other manuscript cultures,⁵² but for Arabic manuscript cultures we do not yet have a systematic approach to understanding medieval reuse practices. Reuse, as we will see, was often a meaningful and highly sophisticated practice where the reused objects have to be read as communicative acts of social and cultural performance. As with document reuse in other settings such as arrow flights,⁵³ textiles⁵⁴ and head-gear,⁵⁵ these reuse practices could very well be highly meaningful acts of re-appropriating and re-purposing spolia of the past.⁵⁶ Currently we know little about the specifics of text reuse. Such texts appear in many different forms and contexts and the present book is intended to make a first modest contribution in this regard. The second key concept refers to the above-mentioned ‘archival practices’ to make sense of the paperwork that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī bound into his books.

Recalibrating the focus from text to physical object in the study of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection will not only bring to the forefront manuscript notes, bound-in sale deeds and liturgical texts in Greek and Georgian, but also the most striking characteristic of this collection: the vast majority of the titles in this collection were not transmitted in the form of book(lets) with one single text (single-text manuscripts). Rather, in many cases we find that a book Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī owned (or here better a ‘codicological unit’) has two, three or even twenty separate texts. Furthermore, these codicological units with several texts have one very specific form: they were not multiple-text manuscripts, that is a codicological unit with several texts worked in a single operation by one scribe.⁵⁷ Rather, they were composite manuscripts, that is a codicological unit in which formerly independent units, small booklets, were bound together.⁵⁸ While the predominance of composite manuscripts might at first glance sound highly (and boringly) technical, we will see in the following, especially under the heading of ‘monumentalisation’, that this material shape of the text is key for understanding the book collection's historical setting and also for understanding what it was meant to do.

In sum, this book turns to material philology in order to reconceptualise the documentary turn for the history of the book and libraries in Middle Eastern history with the key concepts of life cycle, reuse and monumentalisation. In methodological terms, it does so by combining work with both digitised corpora and the actual physical object. Though such a combination is anyway indispensable for working with larger corpora,⁵⁹ it was inevitable for this book as the manuscripts in the National al-Asad Library could only be accessed as reproductions on account of the Syrian war that started in 2011. It would have been easier to opt for a collection that could be researched in a more accessible location – as was the case for the Ashrafiya Library, where most of the matched manuscripts, and the catalogue itself, are in Istanbul. Yet, this would reinforce the current trend of avoiding uneasy choices and opting for the simpler route – as has happened with research on Iraq since the 1990s when it virtually disappeared from research agendas. To compensate for the inaccessibility of the actual manuscripts in Damascus I consulted in situ those manuscripts of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī corpus that were in non-Syrian libraries, especially the Dār al-Kutub in Cairo, the Süleymaniye in Istanbul, the Escorial close to Madrid, the Vatican Library, the Staatsbibliothek in Berlin, the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris and Princeton University Library. For the National al-Asad Library, I mostly had to use digital reproductions of microfilms and photographs taken in the 1980s and the reader will notice their poorer quality in the plates section. In some isolated cases no such reproductions were available and I had to rely on the microfilm series produced in Damascus in the 1960s, which are of considerably lower quality. In some cases I was able to secure Damascene manuscripts in colour, such as the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī fihrist itself.

Terminology

The term ‘Syria’ as used in this book does not refer to the modern nation-state of Syria, but to historical Bilād al-Shām, which includes the modern nation-states of Lebanon, Palestine, Israel, Jordan, Syria (except for northern ⁵⁹ On this topic see Shafir, Researching in Digitized Libraries.

Mesopotamia) and parts of southern Turkey. Exact dates are generally given in the form ‘hijrī date’/‘CE date’ while references to centuries only use the CE century. As has been evident thus far, the terms ‘book’ and ‘manuscript’ will be used interchangeably. For those living in a pre-print culture there was evidently no question that what they held in their hands were plain and simple books. It is only with the increasing dominance of print that the handwritten book gained a new status in the course of the nineteenth century in the Middle East and turned into a ‘manuscript’. I thus strive to use the terms ‘book’ and ‘booklet’ on a regular basis in line with the historical context, but will revert more often to ‘manuscript’ when it comes to codicological matters (thus ‘composite manuscript’ and not ‘composite book’). I use the term ‘codicological unit’, rather than manuscript or book, when I refer to the manuscripts’ materiality.

In the following, the phrase ‘Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection’ refers to the titles mentioned in his fihrist, that is, this term primarily operates on the textual level. ‘Title’ refers to an individual text, whether it comes in the physical form of a single-text manuscript or as one of dozens of other titles within a composite manuscript. For instance, entries 399a, 399b and so on (see Plate I.1) are all individual ‘titles’, even though they are part of one codicological unit. The term ‘Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī manuscript corpus’, by contrast, refers to the physical objects, the codicological units, that once sat on the shelves of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s library and that have been identified in the course of this research in modern libraries.

The term ‘entry’ as used in the following follows the structure of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s catalogue, where each entry received a distinct paragraph (see Plates II.2 and following). One such catalogue entry can, however, relate to one or more codicological units and/or one or more titles. An entry is identical to one title and one codicological unit when it refers to a single-text manuscript (kitāb) in one volume. Entry 55 is a case in point where we have one title, The Refinement of Answers (Tahdhīb al-ajwiba) by Ibn Ḥāmid al-Ḥanbalī (d. 403/1012) in one volume. An entry can also be a single-text manuscript in several volumes (kitāb fī x mujalladāt); in such cases the entry relates to one title, but there is more than one codicological unit. This is for instance the case of entry 24, The Embellishment (al-Taḥbīr) by al-Qādī ‘Alā’ al-Dīn (d. 885/1480), that comes in two volumes. Finally, an entry in the catalogue can also be a composite manuscript (majmū‘); in such cases the entry relates to one codicological unit, but we have more than one title. Entry 205, for example, is a single volume, but contains fourteen texts. This might sound dull, but this terminological precision does matter because the difference between ‘entry’, ‘title’ and ‘codicological unit’ means that there are different numbers for each of them (see Table I.1): we have 579 entries in the fihrist, but on account of single-text manuscripts in several volumes we have a slightly higher number of codicological units (665), and on account of the many composite manuscripts we have a substantially higher number of titles (2,917).

In the fihrist, 538 codicological units are identical to an entry, either because they are composite manuscripts (275), which are by definition in one volume, or single-text manuscripts in one volume (263). Further 127 codicological units go back to those forty-one entries that have single-text manuscripts in two (or more) volumes.⁶⁰ Obviously, it is possible that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī did not always record whether an entry had more than one volume. That would mean that my calculation of the total number of volumes would be too low. However, from my experience of working with the fihrist and matching its entries with extant manuscripts I am fairly confident that this would have been the exception and that we can thus use these numbers for analytical purposes. The only black box is entry number 260 where he simply states ‘several volumes’ (‘iddat mujalladāt), so the total number of codicological units may have been slightly higher than 665.

⁶⁰ In calculating this number only those entries that explicitly refer to two or more ‘volumes’ (mujal-lad) have been taken into account. In contrast, references to the term juz’ (part) have not been taken into account.

Both ‘collection’ (of titles) and ‘corpus’ (of objects) include texts and manuscripts that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī owned, but that others had authored and produced. Yet, they exclude titles and manuscripts written and produced by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī but not mentioned in his fihrist. His complete oeuvre will play a minor role in this book, which is a study of a specific book collection and does not primarily see itself as a contribution to the field of ‘Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādīology’. In whatever way we count the books on Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s shelves, it is important to underline that his was a massive book collection. We get some insights into pre-Ottoman private libraries from the three Ḥaram al-sharīf estate inventories from Jerusalem, where we see much lower numbers of books.⁶¹ If we move further abroad, we see that a private library of 100 books was ‘a substantial collection’ in sixteenth-century England and few were those members of the upper classes who owned more.⁶²

Chapterisation

The first chapter discusses the biography of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī on the basis of the different source corpora available for him. These range from estate inventories and rent agreements via entries in the Ottoman cadastral surveys (tapu tahrir defterleri) to the traces of his life in his manuscript corpus. This chapter sets the scene, most importantly by framing the social and scholarly world of a rather middling scholar, and thus providing the context in which Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī undertook his monumentalisation project. Readers primarily interested in books and bindings can skim through these pages.

⁶² Purcell, Country House Library, p. 56.

The second chapter turns to the foundation of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection in late Mamluk Damascus with a focus on the monumentalisation project. It shows that this collection was built up by a systematic purchasing strategy of books that circulated in Damascus and more specifically in the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter on Mount Qāsyūn. The new collection had a very clear thematic profile with the vast majority of the texts belonging to one single field, ḥadīth transmission, in particular small booklets typical for ḥadīth scholarship in its ‘post-canonical’ period. These texts posed a challenge for Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī as he could not transmit them using the standard protocol of the very period he wanted to remember with this monument of books. The chapter thus discusses his strategies to deal with this problem. The chapter then addresses the highly unusual way he bade farewell to his books – ritualised binge-reading with his family over the course of several months. The very act of endowing the books raises the issue that books continually moved between private ownership and endowment status, neatly demonstrating that endowment practice rather than endowment theory is the best place to start understanding this act. The final part of the chapter discusses why this endowment and monument ended up in the most important madrasa of the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter, the ‘Umariya Madrasa.

Chapter 3 zooms in on the individual manuscript to argue that changing their material form was an indispensable element of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s monumentalisation project. This chapter thus focuses on one of the most intriguing aspects of the collection, namely the large number of composite manuscripts it contained. With reference to multiple title pages and manuscript notes it will show that the material form of the composite manuscript was not the original form of these booklets and that they had, rather, circulated independently. This chapter shows that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī undertook a massive binding project, producing hundreds of new composite manuscripts. Each of these books, containing up to twenty or so booklets, was meant to function as a discrete monument to the bygone period of Ḥanbali Damascene engagement with the Prophet’s words. The chapter thus makes the first historical argument on the material logic of Arabic composite manuscripts on the basis of a large sample. Furthermore Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī developed a uniform system of where to place his manuscript notes (on the title page) and a standardised system of layout. In combination with him using a motto (the one he also used in legal documents) and employing a signature, the chapter argues that these notes functioned as de facto book stamps. In its final part, this chapter discusses the book collection's materiality from the angle of archival practices. Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī used the rebinding process as an opportunity to bind paperwork emanating from his various professional activities into the new books: we thus find for instance book-lending lists, money ledgers, estate inventories issued in his capacity as notary witness and sale contracts. Overall, this chapter shows how studying the material logic of manuscripts is a crucial element to comprehending their historical roles and trajectories.

Chapter 4 follows the subsequent trajectory of the collection, arguing that the survival of so many books from this medieval library in Damascus reflects the low scholarly and cultural value that these books had in subsequent centuries. At the same time notes on extant manuscripts show that some books had already started to move to new shores a few years after Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's death, but the most intensive period of manuscripts departing occurred in the late nineteenth century with European markets playing a major role.

Chapter 5 provides an annotated analysis of the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī *fihris*t itself. It starts with comments on the methodology used and then identifies the individual titles providing information on the 'author', the modern edition (if existing) and the book's thematic field, as well as occasional further information (such as multiple copies and name of copyist). Most importantly, it will in many cases match the title with the actual manuscript and provide data on notes made on it by Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī. Chapter 6 is the diplomatic edition of the catalogue's sole (autograph) manuscript. The indexing of such a large document is inevitably unsatisfying and cannot possibly cater for the various ways researchers might want to use it. In consequence the data contained in Chapter 5 is available as an open-resource database, which allows users to manipulate the information commensurate with their research questions. As there is nothing as unreliable and unstable as references to internet links in printed works, the interested reader is invited to locate it with the search terms 'The Historical Arabic Libraries Database'.

Setting the Scene: The World of a Late Medieval Middling Scholar

The story of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s books is a deeply personal story and this chapter provides the background to his social and scholarly world. It is also a quintessentially Damascene story, one that takes place on the slopes of Mount Qāsyūn in the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter (Map 1.1). It was in this quarter that the protagonist was born, raised, married, had his children, owned a house, worked, endowed his books, died and was buried. He never lived in another city and as far as we know he did not even perform the pilgrimage to Mecca. The farthest he travelled was to Baalbek (Ba‘labakk), no more than thirty-four miles from Damascus as the crow flies. Not only was he himself an impressively local character, but also most of his books were written in Damascus by Damascene scholars and before they reached Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s book shelves most of them – as is evident from the manuscript notes – had exclusively circulated within the city. His story is thus not one that serves the cliché of the medieval globetrotter-scholar criss-crossing the lands in the pursuit of knowledge. Nor are blunt terms such as ‘Islamic’ or ‘Mamluk’ book collection terribly useful for capturing the social and cultural logic of this local collection that we will see unfolding on the following pages.

The Social Angle: Lands, Family and Rulers

Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī came from a large – and at some point arguably the largest – Damascene scholarly dynasty of the Middle Period. The Maqdisī family arrived in Damascus in the mid-twelfth century together with other migrants from the Frankish Kingdom of Jerusalem.¹ Their story is well known: they quickly established themselves under the leadership of Aḥmad b. Qudāma (d. 558/1162) as leading scholars and judges, sometimes infused with saintly standing, within the Ḥanbali community of the city. Damascene Ḥanbalism itself decisively became more popular as a result of the efforts of this family and remained inextricably linked with its members over the coming centuries.² During that time family members preserved in the name ‘al-Maqdisī’ a shared identity around what Stefan Leder has called ‘charismatic scripturalism’, that is a fusion of traditionalist scholarship centred around ḥadīth scholarship with charismatic religious leadership.³ That an outside family was able to quickly insert itself into the social fabric of a city is not too unusual in Middle Eastern history and for Damascus (as the cases of the Manjak and Ghibriyāl families show, to cite just two examples).⁴ However, the Maqdisīs did something quite unusual: a few years after their arrival in the city, dissatisfied with local conditions, they decided to establish their own quarter outside the city walls. This was the Ṣāliḥiyya Quarter on Mount Qāsyūn, which had a very unusual and distinct identity in terms of kinship (Maqdisī) and madhhab (Ḥanbali) when compared with other city quarters in Syria or Egypt of that period.

The Maqdisī kinship group was far too large to function as the main family identity marker and we thus repeatedly see the formation of distinct smaller kinship groups and households around prominent members of the family. The most important of these groups was the Ibn Qudāma line, which in turn branched out into various sub-branches. One of these sub-branches formed around Aḥmad’s brother Yūsuf and came to be known as the ‘Abd al-Hādī family. This household (bayt) was certainly not one of the heavyweights in terms of scholarly prestige compared with that formed around Aḥmad’s son Abū ‘Umar (d. 607/1210).⁵ The descendants of the latter repeatedly come up as the chief Ḥanbali judges of Damascus, the main prize for those striving to combine scholarly prestige with social standing. The ‘Abd al-Hādīs, by contrast, never moved within the highest echelons of scholarly hierarchies.

The household was still running well into the sixteenth century and was thus one of the civilian households of the Mamluk period that had an impressively long lifespan. In a probable response to his family's relatively minor role in the city's social hierarchy, Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī felt an urge to pen its scholarly lore, hence we find among his works a (lost) genealogy of the 'Abd al-Hādīs, a (lost) biographical dictionary of the 'Abd al-Hādīs, a (lost) collection of ḥadīths transmitted by the 'Abd al-Hādīs and a (not lost!) collection of ḥadīths transmitted by one of the 'Abd al-Hādīs.⁶

As the 'Abd al-Hādī household was not a big fish in the scholarly ponds of Damascus, the little that we do know of its members mostly comes from the works of their most famous scion, Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī himself – that is as far as these works have not been lost. It is true that Yūsuf b. Aḥmad (d. 798/1396), his great-grandfather, was the imām of the 'Umariya Madrasa and Muḥammad b. Aḥmad (d. 744/1343), the uncle of his grandfather, held a teaching position there. Yet in the case of Yūsuf it might have helped that he was the grandson of the madrasa's founder, the aforementioned Abū 'Umar, and thus had a strong Banū Qudāma identity.⁷ Other members of the 'Abd al-Hādīs played a rather limited role in terms of the office they held and Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī offers strikingly little detail on their biographies.⁸ We do know that his father Ḥasan (d. 899/1494) was deputy judge for a while.⁹ Among his siblings, his brother Aḥmad (d. 895/1490) was a scholar of some standing and we find his books in the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī collection, but he again did not hold any senior positions.¹⁰ His brother Abū Bakr (d. 883/1478–9) died at a young age, again without having held any prestigious positions.¹¹ While the 'Abd al-Hādīs did not move in the highest echelons of the scholarly elite in social terms, family members do repeatedly come up as extraordinarily active in the classical Maqdisī scholarly field, the transmission of ḥadīth. The best example of this is Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s female ancestor ‘Ā’isha bt. ‘Abd al-Hādī (d. 816/1413), who was a prominent ḥadīth scholar in her time.¹² One of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s sisters, Khadija (d. 930/1524), was also a renowned ḥadīth transmitter, though not one of comparable standing to ‘Ā’isha.¹³

In line with his ancestors, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī also received rather meagre treatment in the biographical dictionaries. His contemporary al-Sakhāwī, who lived in Cairo, was at least aware of him and devoted one line to him in his biographical dictionary.¹⁴ Subsequent Syrian authors recorded greater detail, but their entries were once again on the short side. They depicted him as a ḥadīth scholar and named some of his teachers and students, but they mentioned no posts and gave no further details of his life.¹⁵ Even his student Ibn Ṭūlūn (d. 955/1548), with whom he had an extraordinarily close relationship and to whom we will return again and again, often quoted his works, but in most of his biographical entries he offered little detail on Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī.¹⁶ That was certainly different in the full-scale monograph that Ibn Ṭūlūn devoted to him, The Guide to the Biography of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī.¹⁷ However, this work is lost as it seemingly was not of much interest to subsequent generations of scholars.¹⁸ This lack of interest in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī is striking when viewing it against the massive oeuvre he composed. The rise of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādīology in the course of the twentieth century means we are in danger of forgetting how little interest contemporaries and subsequent generations of scholars actually took in him. While Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī might today seem a towering figure in the scholarly landscape of late medieval Damascus, he effectively never made it into the high ranks of those holding judgeships or prestigious teaching positions. Nor did his works find an avid readership. His world was that of a middling scholar.

In order to get an understanding of how Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī lived, one that goes beyond referring to him with a term as generic and analytically unhelpful as ‘ḥadīth scholar’, the following will turn to the scraps and pieces that can be gleaned from the various sources available for him, especially in his manuscript corpus. As said in the introduction, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī deeply loved to write notes into the books he owned and he also bound various kinds of document into these books that give an insight into his life. Here, we will use this material for factual purposes, but we will see in the subsequent chapters that binding in these documents also followed a cultural logic in that they were part of his monumentalisation project. From this material we know first of all that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī lived in a house (manzil) he owned in the Ṣālīḥīya Quarter, more precisely in the sub-quarter al-Sahm al-a‘lā (The Upper Lot, Map 1.2). He repeatedly states in colophons that it was there that he wrote his works¹⁹ and there are hundreds of manuscript notes that specify the same place for his reading sessions.²⁰ We find that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s father also owned a house (most likely the same one) in this sub-quarter.²¹ Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī did not only own a house in The Upper Lot, but he also possessed an orchard (bustān) in this area, again evident from manuscript notes documenting idyllic reading sessions.²² While we know nothing of house prices in specific sub-quarters, we do know that this area was very conveniently located south of the centre of Ṣālīḥīya on the road to Damascus. This location, in addition to its ample water supply as it was situated between the quarter’s two rivers, Yazīd and Thawrā, meant that this sub-quarter was probably at the more expensive end of the real estate market in Ṣālīḥīya. In addition to these properties, we know that he also owned a garden called Junaynat al-Shiblīya, though we do not know where it was located. This land is named in a note in his hand that he bound into one of his books. Here he mentions the transfer of his properties to his sons in the year 884/1479, when he was in his mid-forties.²³

We have comparatively few documents from the Mamluk period on land ownership in Damascus and Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s archival practices do put us in a very fortunate position when writing about him. However, things are even brighter as we have early Ottoman cadastral surveys, which integrated a lot of Mamluk-period paperwork.²⁴ Indeed, we find here a family endowment (waqf ahli) that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī set up in the year 885/1480–1 with further properties, a year after he had transferred properties to his sons. These include four lots (qit‘a), three plantations (ghirās, referring to planted trees, vines and so forth on land that the cultivator did not own) and a mansion (qā‘a). These do not seem to overlap with the properties previously mentioned so they suggest that he not only had additional properties in The Upper Lot (one lot and a plantation), but also a plantation in Arza²⁵, on the route between Ṣālīḥīya and Damascus, and three lots in the village of al-Saqbā in Eastern Ghūṭa.²⁶

Looking at his real estate, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was thus a man of some means and there are two further indicators that support the impression of some wealth. Firstly, he built up his impressive book collection. While many of these books were of little value in monetary terms, they were of extreme symbolic value to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī and in some cases he had to invest heavily to purchase them.²⁷ We will look at these books in more detail in the following chapters. Secondly, he was the head of a sprawling household that was certainly not cheap to keep. He had at least nine sons and five daughters who were born during the thirty-year period between his mid-twenties and mid-fifties (see Table 1.1). His wife Khadīja (d. c. 880/1475)²⁸ and seven concubines of varying legal status bore him these fourteen children: Ghazāl

The numerous women of his household also raise the question of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s socio-economic status. In contrast to assumptions in previous scholarship, there is no indication that he ever married any of those I refer to as ‘concubines’.³⁷ In his numerous manuscript notes, he never calls any of these women his ‘wife’ (zawja), a term he exclusively used for Khadija.³⁸ In most cases, he does not state any legal status when naming them, but when he does, the terms he uses refer to slaves or manumitted slaves.³⁹ In addition, their names, such as Bulbul al-Rūmīya and Jawhara al-Ḥabashīya, are typical of those of (formerly) unfree members of society. Their exact legal status was clearly evolving as they often appear as mawlāt (manumitted slave) and umm walad (slave whose child's paternity is acknowledged by her master so that the child enjoys free status and the umm walad cannot be sold and will be manumitted upon the death of her master). Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī was, in line with contemporary authors,⁴⁰ not terribly consistent in his terminology when referring to the women in his household and sorting out their exact legal status at different times would be a major challenge, if not impossible.

What matters here is that these concubines initially came into his household as slaves and that Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī had the financial means to take on so many of them. To make an argument for a link between the presence of female slaves and elevated socio-economic status is far from straightforward. Yossef Rapoport has argued that in the late fifteenth century, men of modest means owned concubines as substitutes for a wife they could not afford.⁴¹ However, the examples he discusses are those where a single concubine is in the household, not at least eight, as in the case of Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī. The presence of these concubines, in addition to his wife, can thus be taken as an indicator of an elevated socio-economic status. And the same goes for other members of his enlarged family: we thus learn from manuscript notes of a mawlāt called Bulbul in his father's household⁴² and a mawlāt with the same name in his brother's household.⁴³ However, the identity of Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's only wife, Khadīja, shows that he did not marry into a particularly prominent family. We know very little about her and her full name is only given as 'daughter of Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Warrāq', that is coming from a family of makers or traders of paper – Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's world was indeed one of books.⁴⁴

⁴⁰ For instance, his contemporary Ibn Ṭawq, interchangeably uses in his al-Ta'liq the terms 'wife' and 'umm walad'.

As a caveat to these observations relating to the high number of concubines it must be mentioned that they were not all members of his household at the same time. Again, we cannot disentangle all their individual life stories, but just to give one example: his mawlāt Dūlāt first appears in a manuscript note in the year 877/1473,⁴⁵ but she seemingly did not give birth to a child while she was in his household. Some twenty years later she participates once again in one of his reading sessions, she is still called his ‘freed slave’, but in the meantime she must have left the household to become the wife of a certain Shaykh ‘Alī.⁴⁶

In addition, death repeatedly led to the loss of members of his household. While we have few specific details on this, the dynamics of his manuscript notes on textual transmission give some insight. The manuscript notes involving Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī start in the year 857/1453 when he was seventeen years old and go right up to his death. In these notes his family members play the prominent role – in fact the vast majority of notes only involve relatives. One of these is his first-born son ‘Abd al-Raḥmān (b. c. 866/1462), who makes regular appearances in these notes at a young age, but then suddenly disappears from the record after the age of seven, presumably because he had died.⁴⁷ His second-born son Muḥammad must have also died as a child as he too disappears from the record at a young age.⁴⁸ In the same vein, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s wife Khadija, most likely the mother of ‘Abd al-Raḥmān, suddenly disappears from the manuscript record some seven years later.⁴⁹ For reasons to be seen later, we have a particularly large cluster of notes, and thus very detailed documentation, from the following years, but no traces whatsoever can be found of any of the three of them.

⁴⁷ The last note referring to him is in MS Cairo, Dār al-Kutub, Taymūr ḥadīth 222, fol. 95b, samā’-note dated 873/1469 (cf. no. 139a).

In addition, we know from one of his writings that his first concubine named Bulbul (he later bought another concubine by the same name and we thus have ‘Bulbul 1’ and ‘Bulbul 2’) passed away in an epidemic in the year 883/1478–9 when Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was in his early forties.⁵⁰ The fact that he had two daughters by the name ‘Ā’isha makes it likely that the first-born ‘Ā’isha (a daughter of the first Bulbul) had passed away. The presence of death is reflected in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s own oeuvre as he wrote a treatise to console parents upon the loss of a child.⁵¹ He also authored a lost work (perhaps after the death of his wife and son, Khadīja and ‘Abd al-Raḥmān, as well as his concubine and daughter, Bulbul and ‘Ā’isha) on Sorrow and Grief upon the Loss of Mother and Child (al-Huzn wa-al-kamad bi-mawt al-umm wa-al-walad, entry number 200b). Furthermore, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī composed at least one book to specifically honour a deceased mother of his children, his first concubine called Bulbul. Bulbul certainly had a prominent role in the household after the death of ‘Abd al-Raḥmān and Muḥammad, as at that point she became the mother of the then eldest son, ‘Abd al-Hādī. In his book Picking the Ears on the Reports of the Nightingale (Laṭ al-sunbul fī akhbār al-Bulbul), Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī brought together various texts on the nightingale (bulbul) with reports on his deceased concubine, ‘a blessed woman’.⁵² We have similar examples of very close relationships with concubines, such as a Damascene judge of the same period who buried his concubine next to the grave of his parents.⁵³

So far, we have got to know Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī as the head of a massive household and as a man who was in terms of his social position quite unremarkable. However, there is one element in his biography that does not sit easily with this description of his social status. In the year 903/1497 the Damascene governor Īnāl revolted against the sultan in Cairo. The inhabitants of the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter sided with the sultan's men and one of Īnāl's officers, Āqbirdī, wrote to them in no uncertain terms asking them to change sides. Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī was asked to act as the envoy to convey the reply.⁵⁴ This anecdote has been described in modern scholarship as him being 'elected neighbourhood spokesperson ... making him the political embodiment of the people' of the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter.⁵⁵ Yet, Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's own report of this event – and this is the only one we have – strikes a more modest tone. Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī was merely one of several individuals who were asked to act as envoy and they all refused. As the chosen envoy had to convey the quarter's refusal to side with a group of grumpy rebels, it was probably not the most popular task on offer during these events. Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī thus kicked the mission into the long grass and did what any decent scholar would do: he sat down to write a lengthy reply to this officer's demands.⁵⁶

Though Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī preferred words to deeds when it came to politics, he was not apolitical. In his oeuvre we find a small number of panegyric titles for rulers with a fair amount of advice and admonishment. That Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī authored such titles puts him in a long pedigree of Mamluk-era scholars who tackled issues linked with political thought in such 'minor' works.⁵⁷ Yet, there is one rather unexpected element in this line of works, namely that Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī did not extol the Mamluk rulers of his city and his region. Rather, he celebrated and addressed their political competitors in the wider Middle East, the Ottoman and Aqqoyunlu rulers. He thus authored the Gem of Time (Jawharat al-zamān) on the Ottoman Sultan Mehmed II (r. 848/1444–886/1481 with interruption),⁵⁸ the Bird Song on the Virtues (al-Taḡhrīd fī manāqib al-Sultān al-sa'īd Abī Zayd) on Mehmed's son, Sultan Bayezid II (r. 886/1481–918/1512)⁵⁹ and the Delights of Hearts (Tafriḥ al-qulūb) on the Aqqoyunlu ruler Ya'qūb b. Uzun Ḥasan

(r. 883/1478–896/1490).⁶⁰ Considering the fact that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī died well before the Ottomans conquered Syria and Egypt, it is quite striking that he had such limited loyalty towards his nominal rulers. This is not to say that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī necessarily put all his eggs in one basket, as he did compose a panegyric for a Mamluk officer. The question is whether it was ironic.⁶¹

Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s limited loyalty to his rulers is arguably linked with changes in how the Mamluk elites controlled cities such as Damascus in the late fifteenth century. As Toru Miura has argued, in this period we see ‘factions’ (I would prefer to call them ‘households’) around chief judges and governors increasingly playing the main role in the urban administration. This was accompanied by a privatisation of endowment properties that was detrimental to those who relied on salaried positions.⁶² This smacks of decline and this is how scholarship has generally seen this period. However, Jo van Steenberghe has repeatedly argued for a more nuanced approach and has underlined that such decline was not all-encompassing. The fierce criticisms of Mamluk rule precisely came from those scholars who had some vested interest in how wealth and authority was to be distributed. So the dismal picture of the late Mamluk period in their writings can also be read not as a weakening of Mamluk rule, but, on the contrary, as a reaction to the internal expansion of state structures.⁶³

We will not settle the question of how the Mamluk system as a whole developed in this period here, but Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī is in any case a neat example of a scholar who hoped for greener pastures under new rulers. Such a positive view of the Mamluks’ rivals was possibly particularly strong outside Cairo. After the Ottomans conquered Damascus more than a decade after Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s death, Damascene historians have a much more positive take on the conquest than their Cairene counterparts.⁶⁴ Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s closest student, Ibn Ṭūlūn, depicts the political change in especially positive terms and cooperates very willingly with the new elites.⁶⁵ One might see this as the opportunistic move of a scholar who did very well indeed under the new rulers. However, a reading of Ibn Ṭūlūn's positive take on the Ottomans against the background of Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's panegyrics of the same dynasty some two decades earlier, suggests that there might be more than opportunism to this. Rather, we might have a longer-term shift of political loyalties in some quarters of Damascene society long before the Ottoman conquest.

Earning One's Living in Late Mamluk Damascus

How then did Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī earn a living that kept this sprawling household running and allowed him to build up a huge book collection at the same time? His biographers are, as might be expected, silent on his sources of income, except for al-Sakhāwī who is the only one to state that he worked as deputy judge.⁶⁶ This Cairene author is probably not best placed for details on Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's life and one might suspect that he confounded father and son as Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's father was – as we have seen – indeed deputy judge. Even if Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī himself held this position, this must have been an ephemeral episode as it left no other narrative or documentary traces whatsoever. What is evident, however, is that Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī was active in the judiciary in Damascus in another, more modest, capacity, namely as a notary witness ('adl). In his book on juridical practice in Mamluk Jerusalem on the basis of the Ḥaram al-sharīf documents, Christian Müller has shown to what extent such professional witnesses were an indispensable part of legal administration, acting as 'notaries' for private legal transactions and as court-appointed witnesses validating judges' documents. For a town as small as Jerusalem, over a period of only four years he counted some 100 witnesses who were very much the – often-overlooked – circulatory system of the judiciary.⁶⁷

Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī never called himself a notary witness and nor did anybody else. He left, nevertheless, traces of his job in the paperwork that he bound into his books. In his role as notary, he repeatedly signed documents that Müller defines as business deeds (Geschäftsurkunden), that is legal transactions where the contractual partners had recourse to professional witnesses to ensure the legal validity of the deed in case of later court disputes.⁶⁸

These include a sale contract of lands worth twenty Dinars dated 882/1477, which Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī signed as one of three witnesses (Plate I.2).⁶⁹ Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī also worked directly for the court and we thus find a piece of paperwork that shows his involvement in one of the most routine activities of the notary witness: settling the estates of the deceased. In this case it is a list written by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī and documenting the public sale of the goods of a certain Shaykh ‘Umar in the year 863/1459.⁷⁰ Such lists are also present in the Ḥaram al-sharīf documents from Jerusalem and we find very similar features: layout in columns, no witness signatures and scant details on the context in which these lists were produced.⁷¹

In addition to the documentary evidence, there is one more indicator that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s main professional activity was that of a notary witness. In his oeuvre we find a rather brief biographical dictionary of Ḥanbali scholars that he wrote as a continuation (dhayl) of the great dictionary of the Damascene Ḥanbali Ibn Rajab (d. 795/1392). This dictionary reflects Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s world in many ways that are directly relevant for us. Most importantly, ḥadīth transmission featured as the main criterion for selection and assessment of the scholars in his dictionary. In its geographical focus, Ḥanbalism was for him virtually synonymous with the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter and the second major Syrian town with a large Ḥanbali community, Baalbek.⁷² When he writes about scholars from Baalbek, and they are the only well-represented group of scholars from outside Ṣāliḥīya, there is one striking and at first glance rather obscure interest, noting down whenever a biographee was a notary witness.⁷³ This strong interest in registering what was a rather secondary professional activity, while not registering other similar activities, certainly reflects who Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was himself.

Apart from earning his living as professional witness, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī surely made money from his orchard and garden. A receipt he bound into one of his books shows that he also rented further lands. Here the owner confirms that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī paid the annual rent (muḥākara) for the year 884/1479–80 for a piece of land known as ‘al-Jurūf’ and belonging to an endowment (Plate I.3).⁷⁴ At the same time, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī might have owned and rented out other lands that he owned in the Ghūṭa, the Damascus hinterland – though the source basis for this is on the weak side.⁷⁵ To what extent he used the different lands he worked for commercial purposes or for subsistence is not evident, but renting lands indicates that the former is not unlikely. In addition, commercial purposes seem likely as he was part of a group of authors in the late Mamluk period who composed manuals on agriculture and water management, in his case the Copious Ideas on Mentioning Rivers (Ghadaq al-afkār fī dhikr al-anhār).⁷⁶ As Bethany Walker argued, these texts ‘reflect an insider’s knowledge of agriculture’ by ‘scholar-agrarian specialists-gentleman farmers’ and were much more than legalistic or abstract treatises.⁷⁷

We would expect a scholar as prolific as Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī to have also held a series of remunerated teaching positions. There were madrasas galore in Damascus and especially in the Ṣāliḥiyya Quarter. Furthermore, he was closely associated with the ‘Umarīya Madrasa where we find him writing his books, holding reading sessions and where, after all, his books found their resting place for the next 400 years. Yet, in biographies of the following centuries we only find the statement that he ‘gave lessons’.⁷⁸ To deduct from this that he was appointed to a ‘teaching position’⁷⁹ seems to me to be jumping the gun, especially as we have a major chronicle of the Damascene teaching institutions written shortly after Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s death. Its author, al-Nu‘aymī (d. 927/1521), also provides the biographies of those who held teaching positions in the different institutions.⁸⁰ He even quotes Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī when discussing the ‘Umarīya Madrasa, but nowhere does he mention that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī ever held a remunerated position in this or any other institution. In the same vein, the most splendid and detailed description of the ‘Umarīya Madrasa can be found in Ibn Ṭūlūn’s history of Ṣālihiyya. Again, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s closest student quoted him, but said nothing on any positions Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī might have held.⁸¹ The only such indication we have is a statement by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī himself that he was holding a teaching circle (ḥalqa) in this madrasa on Tuesdays, but this again does not sound like a full-blown salaried position.⁸²

From Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s fihrist and especially one of his autobiographies, Naming my Books (Tasmiya li-kutubī, more on this in Chapter 5), we know that he also composed Friday sermons (khuṭbas).⁸³ Yet there is no evidence that he did so as a paid preacher (khaṭīb) in one of the Damascene mosques. There is always the possibility that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī chose not to take salaried positions of his own free will. Dreading too much proximity to the political elites who often supported endowments would not have been an entirely alien concept in his Ḥanbalī peer group. However, he had no qualms working in the judiciary system and a position in the ‘Umarīya Madrasa would have surely been acceptable to him. Why else would he place his book in this madrasa?

With his income from agriculture and as notary witness, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī seemingly built up substantial cash assets. We know about this from a set of ‘inda-accounts’, lists of individuals that owed him money. These accounts in the hand of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī are not only interesting for gaining insight into his social position, but also because they are the first-known lists of their kind from medieval Damascus. They have once again survived because of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s practice of binding personal paperwork into his books. These accounts are highly concise lists of names with a number (sometimes followed by the currency) written beneath them (Plate I.4). It might thus be overly optimistic to deduce any commercial activities from these lists. However, we do have a comparable set of ‘inda-accounts from Mamluk Syria, more precisely among the Ḥaram al-sharīf documents from Jerusalem, which have significantly more context. In their analysis, Christian Müller has convincingly argued that they come from the commercial sphere.⁸⁴

In our case we have four such accounts, two of which are complete sheets⁸⁵ and two others that are incomplete.⁸⁶ Obviously, these four sheets are a random insight into Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s commercial activities as many more accounts must have existed, most of which are not extant and some of which may still reside in other books that I have not identified. These lists are not final accounts drawn up at the end of a month or a year, but ongoing lists that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī kept up to date. This is evident from the crossed-out names and sums that we see in these lists (Plate I.4 has eight such crossed-out entries). These lists not only include debts owed to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, but also some debts that he owed to others. On Plate I.4 we see for instance that he owed the heirs of a certain ‘Āmir sixteen Dinars (second row, fourth entry) and a certain Zayn al-Dīn Khiḍr fifty (most likely Dirhams) for a jubba, a woollen garment (seventh row, first entry).⁸⁷

The monies owed to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī range from rather paltry sums of a single Dirham to hefty figures of more than 100 Dinars. The lists do not give any indication as to why these individuals owed him money. They might have been debts that the individuals had incurred in the course of buying goods in which Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī traded or they might have been cash sums that he had lent to them. Irrespective of the transactions that underlaid these debts, it is evident that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was able to shift large amounts of money. Having so much cash certainly puts him well above the average inhabitant of late medieval Damascus. However, his modest job as notary witness shows that his other sources of income were never so abundant that he could exclusively engage in them to earn his living. In addition, we know that the women of his household independently earned wages. That his beloved first Bulbul, for instance, worked as spinner from home might indicate that money was not infinite in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī household.⁸⁸ One might take this line of thought further when we look at a cookery book he authored. Rather than fancy haute cuisine, what we get here is a pedestrian diet with loads of vegetables and some meat, but few expensive ingredients such as sugar, nuts and spices – in the words of its translator a ‘bourgeoise’ cuisine.⁸⁹ This cook-book is clearly an original book written in a colloquial register and not just a reworking of the great cookery books from earlier periods that were written for the select few and reflected food ideals of the highest social echelons. It is reasonable to assume that it reflects the modest dietary horizons of its author and his household.

What we have here is thus a scholar of some means who earned his life in a variety of ways with his judiciary job as notary witness certainly playing a central role to sustain himself and his household. We are in the fortunate position of having a unusually personal text of an individual, the journal of Ibn Ṭawq (d. 915/1509), who was a contemporary of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī who lived in Damascus and also hardly travelled beyond the region of Damascus and who, most significantly, also earned his living for the most part as a notary witness.⁹⁰ In his study of this journal, Torsten Wollina shows Ibn Ṭawq’s daily life criss-crossing Damascus to draw up legal paperwork as well as his struggle to maintain his extended household.⁹¹ While it is not entirely clear how many concubines Ibn Ṭawq owned, his reports about other households show that an elevated number of child-bearing concubines, as in the case of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, was not unusual.⁹² Ibn Ṭawq’s most important sources of income came from his activities as notary witness and from the sale of agricultural products from his own lands. Just like Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, he owned an orchard as well as some additional gardens and lands. Overall, one gets the impression of a modest household where animal husbandry is limited to the chickens he kept in his orchard.⁹³ This might very well be true for Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī as well, though among the lists he left behind none refers to egg sales.

Flopping Books and Shoddy Scripts

So far, we have got to know Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī as a rather middling scholar in social terms who never held prestigious paid positions. Yet, when we turn to his self-perceived role as a scholar he was far from middling. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī authored, according to my own estimate, over 800 works.⁹⁴ He thus belongs to the select group of highly prolific authors who penned several hundreds of works, a phenomenon that was particularly common in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. To these belong his Cairene contemporary al-Suyūṭī (d. 911/1505) and his own student Ibn Ṭūlūn in Damascus. On account of the loss of books and conflicting information on titles, it is always difficult to provide exact numbers, but the number of almost 1,000 titles for al-Suyūṭī and over 700 for Ibn Ṭūlūn gives at least a taste of the magnitude we are talking about.⁹⁵

Such a number of works sets Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī very clearly apart from other individuals who inhabited his social world of notary witnesses with additional business activities. Ibn Ṭawq, for instance, left us his journal, but there is no indication that he ever authored another work. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, by contrast, wrote 671 works up until the year 897/1492 alone (the fihrist gives us, conveniently, a number and date for this medieval author’s output at one specific point). If we assume that he started churning out his works around the age of twenty, he wrote a new work every three weeks over a period of almost forty years. At least in terms of writing speed, that rhythm does not sound too unlikely if we compare it with a copyist's worklist from the early fifteenth century that Mehmet Arıkan has recently unearthed. According to his calculation, this copyist finished a work every three to four weeks, among them extremely voluminous books such as al-Bukhārī's Ṣaḥīḥ.⁹⁶

While Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī certainly authored a great many works, they were not exactly bestsellers and people did not race to gain access to them: the vast majority of his books, some 80 per cent, have simply been lost or are at least not accounted for.⁹⁷ Even more striking, an even larger majority (well over 95 per cent) have never been copied, not even once. Among the hundreds of works that he authored a single title was a success, his illustrated genealogy of the Prophet Muḥammad The Prophetic Tree (al-Shajara al-nabawīya).⁹⁸ With at least a dozen copies extant this work was, in terms of Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's oeuvre, outstandingly popular. Yet, this work is an outlier in many senses and is not typical of the way Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī composed and published his books. For a start, this is the only extant work of Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī for which we do not have an autograph, probably because such an autograph never existed in the first place: even the manuscript that was on Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's shelves was beautifully executed by a (unknown) professional scribe/book illustrator. Illustrated genealogies are very much driven by their mise-en-page, especially the highly ornamented diagrams that show the relationships between the individuals. While Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī could claim substantial 'intellectual ownership', a (or perhaps the) major factor behind this book's success, its design, was, frustratingly, the work of somebody else.

This does matter because the Shajara is in this sense an isolated case of bookmanship. Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī was skilled in many ways, but he was not a very visual individual. In the books he wrote himself, margins varied considerably and the idea of a text block was not particularly compelling to him. The lines in a standard Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī manuscript can start anywhere and they can end anywhere. The reader looks in vain for uniformity such as the same number of lines per page. Many of his works have such idiosyncratic organisation and mise-en-page that drawing the line between draft and finished version is difficult and at times simply impossible. The fihrist is one of his best organised books and gives a somewhat skewed idea of what his manuscripts look like (Plate I.5 is a more typical example). That Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī outsourced the production of the Shajara to a skilled illustrator was certainly because of his perceptiveness of where his skills did and did not lie. Similarly, it is probably not by chance that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī did not embark on copying books. There are hardly any manuscripts in the hand of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī that are not his own works. For this scholar-agrarian, managing lands was certainly a better use of his time than professionally copying manuscripts.

In light of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s somewhat limited contribution to the Shajara, it is ironic that it was not only his bestseller but that it was also the only work that found transregional interest among Ottoman-era readers in Istanbul, as is evident from the numerous copies held in various historical sub-collections of the Süleymaniye Library.⁹⁹ Apart from the Shajara al-nabawīya, I have only been able to find two copies of other Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī books that made their way to Istanbul.¹⁰⁰ Yet, not one of his autographs went to Istanbul. Even if we look at those books in the fihrist that were not authored by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, they hardly ever made their way to Istanbul.¹⁰¹ This is particularly noteworthy as we have the contrasting example of the Ashrafiya Library from Damascus, of which most extant manuscripts are today precisely in Istanbul as they gravitated towards the cultural and scholarly centre of the Middle East in the early modern period.¹⁰² The Istanbul collections also hold manuscripts that had previously been endowed in the Ḍiyā’iya Library. We will return to this question in Chapter 4, but it is evident that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s books – in contrast to many others – did not cater for the reading tastes and scholarly interests of the following generations in Damascus, Istanbul or elsewhere.

Looking at the numbers of copies made, there is a wide gap after the Shajara al-nabawīya before the next work on Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s bestseller list. This is a medical work, Funūn al-manūn, of which at least two copies have been produced (one of the Istanbul copies and one in Oxford).¹⁰³ Already we have almost reached the end of this very short list of bestsellers: there is a work on Sufism in Princeton copied in his lifetime,¹⁰⁴ and a copy of a paraenetic work in Escorial that has been wrongly identified as an autograph.¹⁰⁵ However, there is an unexpected twist in this story of copies of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī works: we do have a significant cluster of very late manuscript copies that reflect the increasing interest in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī in the course of the twentieth century. Interestingly, the largest cluster of manuscript copies was produced at the end of the manuscript age when book production was increasingly transitioning to print. For instance, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s legal treatise on dogs was copied in Damascus by Ṣādiq Fahmī al-Mālīḥ, twice to be sent to Egypt between 1919 and 1920, most likely for the collection of Aḥmad Taymūr (d. 1930), and once to be sent to Baghdad in 1928.¹⁰⁶ Likewise, the only extant copy of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s biographical dictionary of Ḥanbali scholars was produced in Saudi Arabia in al-Ṭā’if in 1943 by Sulaymān Ibn Ḥamdān.¹⁰⁷

While we have so far focused on those rare books that did have some circulation, let us now turn to one example of what is more typical of his oeuvre: non-circulating books. Here we can take his Book of Correctness and Clarity of Ḥadīth Transmitters who Had Defects [in Their Ḥadīth] and Physical Plights (al-Dabṭ wa-al-tabayīn li-dhawī al-‘ilal wa-al-‘āhāt min al-muḥaddithīn).¹⁰⁸ Kristina Richardson discussed this book on ḥadīth transmitters with bodily defects, such as the blind, the hemiplegic and the wall-eyed, and came to the Ibn ‘Abd al-Khālīq, al-Fihris al-waṣfī, p. 95: al-Iqtibās li-ḥall mushkil sirat Ibn Sayyid al-nās, copied in 1921). This copyist also appears in numerous other works not linked with Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī such as al-Ghazzī, Lutf al-samar, p. 166. Most of these copies went into the collection of Aḥmad Taymūr.

succinct conclusion that ‘it seems not to have circulated widely’.¹⁰⁹ She shows that there are no traces of contemporary scholars or those of the following generations taking any notice of it. Worse still, even his most devoted student Ibn Ṭūlūn, who himself wrote a treatise on this topic, hardly refers to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s book. This book is, as might be expected, preserved in a single copy and this copy, still in Damascus, is the autograph.

So far, I have taken the non-circulation of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s books as evidence that they found no or little readership. One might turn the argument around and say, as Torsten Wollina did with regard to Ibn Ṭūlūn, that this lack of engagement with the actual copies (reading, copying, lending and so on) was due to the absorption of the texts into other works through quotes and paraphrasing.¹¹⁰ In this line of argument, the non-circulation of the original works has nothing to do with unpopularity and more to do with scholarly practices that had fewer qualms about ‘plagiarism’. The popularity of a work would thus be disconnected from the actual copies that were made of it and it would rather be connected to this work’s after-life in other texts. Nevertheless, in the case of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī this argument falls down as we have only one scholar who systematically quoted, reused and paraphrased his books, incidentally Ibn Ṭūlūn himself. One example of this is Ibn Ṭūlūn’s biographical work The Elevated Chambers on the Biographies of the later Ḥanafīs (al-Ghuraf al-‘aliya fi tarājim muta’ akhkhiri al-Ḥanafīya), where the author relied to a large extent on Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s Blooming Garden (al-Riyād al-yāni‘a).¹¹¹ The manuscript of al-Riyād itself, which Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī listed in his fihrist, is lost and we only have a draft version (Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī himself calls it a draft).¹¹² The most famous example of a lost Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī work that was absorbed into other works is his History of Ṣāliḥīya (Tārīkh al-Ṣāliḥīya). This work was again heavily used by Ibn Ṭūlūn, especially in his own history of this quarter, the Jewelled Necklaces: The History of al-Ṣāliḥīya (al-Qalā’ id al-jawhariya fi tārikh al-Ṣāliḥīya). It was then abridged by another Damascene scholar, Ibn Kannān (d. 1153/1740), under the title Meadows of Brocade as *Concerns the History of al-Ṣāliḥīya (al-Murūj al-sundusiya al-fāsiḥa fī talkhiṣ tāriḫ al-Ṣāliḥīya).*¹¹³ Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s original has been lost, but here it can indeed be argued that his work had a considerable after-life. However, most of his oeuvre, such as the above-mentioned legal treatise on dogs or his work on ḥadīth transmitters with bodily defects, was not taken up until the twentieth century.

Modern scholarship has noted the non-reception of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s oeuvre until the twentieth century, but has not fully explained it. We do get some indirect hints such as the ‘lone star in the dark sky argument’ where Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī is an isolated luminary in ‘the age of darkness’.¹¹⁴ This argument might be combined with the different treatment of al-Suyūṭī, whose oeuvre was taken care of by the ‘Egyptians’ (seemingly in contrast to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī and the Syrians).¹¹⁵ However, the most current explanation has been to pin down the limited after-life of his works to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s book hand, which is indeed not exactly the most legible.¹¹⁶ For instance, he uses diacritics very sparsely (if he uses them, they more often than not turn out to be misleading), he liberally interprets conventions of separating letters, and his letter shapes are often highly unusual. Editors of his works have thus described his script as ‘shoddy’ (radī)¹¹⁷ as ‘he wrote a lot at great speed; there are few who can read his hand because it is entangled and without diacritics’.¹¹⁸ This bewilderment at his book hand is not only a phenomenon of our age: Ibn Kannān (d. 1153/1740) complained that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s hand was to a large extent illegible.¹¹⁹ Together with his untamed mise-en-page, modern scholarship, as we have seen, has often taken his books to be drafts even though they were meant to be the final version. For instance, the only surviving copy of his biographical work The Utmost Desire (Nihāyat al-marām) was called a ‘draft’ by its editor.¹²⁰ Yet, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī clearly did not consider this work to be a draft as he not only adorned it with a colophon, but also gave his children permission to transmit the text (ijāza).¹²¹

While complaints about his book hand and page organisation are certainly not entirely unwarranted, it has to be said in defence of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī that this probably goes back to the simple fact that his was not a ‘book’ hand in the first place.¹²² As we have seen, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī earned his life to a large extent as a notary witness drafting legal documents. Anybody who has worked with legal documents from this period would not be very surprised by his script, which exhibits many features that are typical of a highly professionalised group of experts who had to produce high quantities of fairly formulaic documents for an in-group of readers. If we consider those legal documents written by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī that have survived (for example Plate I.2) we do indeed see the very same hand – a hand that looks quite standard in a documentary context. While his book hand and mise-en-page might have played a role in why Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s oeuvre had such a faint after-life, it is too much of a stretch to exclusively put it down to this factor.

The Scholarly Profile: Post-canonical ḥadīth Transmission and Not Much Else

There is a different main reason as to why subsequent generations disregarded Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s oeuvre, namely changing scholarly modes. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s main field of scholarly activity was that of ḥadīth, the transmissions concerning the sayings and deeds attributed to Muḥammad, and the way Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī engaged with these transmissions was simply on the way out. These transmissions had started to circulate after the development of Islam in a combination of oral and written modes, best captured in Schoeler’s phrase ‘from the aural to the read’.¹²³ From the ninth century these traditions were increasingly subject to a process of ‘canonisation’. As a result, authoritative written collections of ḥadīths, most famously those by the two scholars al-Bukhārī (d. 256/870) and Muslim (d. 261/875), came into being. These collections established a (never entirely fixed) canon of traditions that was increasingly deemed to be authentic – a process that lasted well into the twelfth century. However, this process was not uncontested as it prioritised the written mode of transmission to the detriment of oral practices.¹²⁴ Crucially, it challenged the professional identity of those scholars who transmitted ḥadīth. What was the point of having a large group of highly specialised scholars safeguarding the textual witnesses of the prophetic model in oral modes of transmission when all these witnesses had now become accessible in an established corpus of written texts?

Garrett Davidson offers a splendid analysis of how the field of ḥadīth scholarship reacted to the challenges of the canonisation process – and this is exactly the scholarly mode of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī. Davidson shows that ḥadīth scholars developed an ‘ideology of orality’, which asserted that the continuous oral transmission of the traditions had a value for its own sake as an essential and distinguishing trait of the Muslim community. Continuing to transmit traditions, irrespective of the existence of the authoritative collections, was reconfigured as an act of piety linking each generation anew to the Prophet. In this way the isnāds, chains of transmission between the scholar and the Prophet Muḥammad, did not become obsolete, but remained a crucial form of social capital and retained a paramount position in scholarly practices. This post-canonical reconfiguration of the field of ḥadīth studies resulted in the emergence of new textual genres that bore witness to the continuous vivacity of the field, such as the mu‘jam or mashyakha (presenting an author’s shortest and most prized chains of transmission) and collections of forty ḥadīths (more on that in Chapter 2).¹²⁵

While scholarship has thus now sketched the broad outline of this post-canonical ḥadīth transmission in the Middle Period, we know much less about variations among regions and cities.¹²⁶ With reference to Damascus, it can be argued that this post-canonical ḥadīth scholarship was in the ascendant in the twelfth century, came into full swing in the thirteenth century, slowly started to lose its footing in the fourteenth century and was in steep decline by the lifetime of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī in the fifteenth century.¹²⁷ To be clear, what I present here is not an argument for a large-scale decline of Damascene, Syrian, Mamluk, Islamic or world society as a whole. Rather, what we have here is the vanishing of one specific form of engagement with the Prophet’s word in one city. Other forms of engagement, such as ḥadīth commentary or rituals centred around the collection of al-Bukhārī, remained active fields. Most importantly, our knowledge of Ottoman-period ḥadīth scholarship remains rather limited so that we hardly know what exactly happened in this field in a city such as Damascus.

The above chronology for post-canonical ḥadīth scholarship is very much based on the world of manuscript notes as we find them on ḥadīth manuscripts circulating in Damascus. In the field of Middle Eastern history, it has been difficult to make any quantitative arguments on the basis of such notes as we still lack a dedicated resource to use them for research purposes. Luckily, the only attempt so far to make accessible any large corpus of such transmission notes in manuscripts pertains to Damascus. This is the Index of Damascene Audition Certificates (Mu‘jam al-samā‘āt al-dimashqīya) by Stefan Leder, Yāsīn Muḥammad al-Sawwās and Ma‘mūn al-Ṣāgharjī. This work indexes and reproduces over 1,300 notes, namely audition certificates in which the teacher transmits the right to teach a specific text to his or her student(s). The relevant point here is that the three editors decided to limit the period they cover to between the mid-twelfth and the mid-fourteenth century, what they call the ‘golden age’ of ḥadīth in Damascus.¹²⁸ And indeed, if we open at random one of the ḥadīth manuscripts from the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection we see folia after folia of manuscript notes, regularly starting in the eleventh and more often in the twelfth century. We then observe a continuous chain of transmissions over the generations linking each note to the next. Yet these notes, and thus the chain, breaks off in the fifteenth century at the latest; more often the chain is already broken in the fourteenth century.

This Damascene ‘golden age’ was especially relevant for Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī as one kinship group dominated this extremely vivid scholarly landscape, the Maqdisī family. If we take the Index of Damascene Audition Certificates, we see that some 13 per cent of all participants named in the index were Maqdisīs (841 out of 6,544). More meaningful still is the family’s ‘weighted participation’: the number of reading sessions in which each individual participated. Here we see that the number of Maqdisīs more or less doubles, as they constituted over 25 per cent of all participants in all reading sessions (3,325 out of 13,038). If we consider the teachers (musmi‘) in these reading sessions, the centrality of the Maqdisīs for ḥadīth transmission in Damascus and the centrality of ḥadīth for members of this family emerges even more clearly: Maqdisīs presided over more than 43 per cent of all sessions (537 out of 1,241).¹²⁹ Finally, the Maqdisīs really were the stars of Damascene ḥadīth scholarship: if we look at the larger sessions (defined as having more than twenty participants), it was a Maqdisī who presided over two-thirds of them.¹³⁰

Even though post-canonical ḥadīth transmission, or at least its protocol of manuscript notes, had already come to an end in Damascus by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s lifetime, this field constituted the most important part of his scholarly universe. We will return to it in more detail in the following chapters as it is the main clue to understanding his book collection as a project of monumentalisation. If we look at the other fields of interest of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī beyond ḥadīth, he cannot be easily slotted into just a few categories. He easily traversed many of the disciplinary borders that we might want to use to define him, in line with the other highly prolific writers of his age, such as al-Suyūṭī. Both are best defined as ‘polymath’. We have seen that he composed agricultural manuals as well as cookbooks and to this we can add topographical surveys of bathhouses,¹³¹ books on *jinn*s,¹³² treatises on the Prophet's birth¹³³ and works on love¹³⁴ to name but a few.

However, there are two fields of knowledge apart from ḥadīth in which he composed a larger number of works: law (fiqh) and medicine. In the field of law, he evidently wrote within the parameters of his madhhab, the Ḥanbali school. His main concern was not to reflect upon uṣūl al-fiqh, that is on the questions of what sources are permissible and what methodology should be applied to extrapolate rules from these sources. Rather, he wrote treatises on very concrete issues including, as we have seen, his legal treatise on dogs. To this we can add works on divorce-related questions,¹³⁵ the rules pertaining to bathhouses (ranging from who should use them to marrying in a bathhouse),¹³⁶ the rules pertaining to the turban,¹³⁷ and the problem of sacrificial animals slaughtered by non-Muslims.¹³⁸ In the same vein, he composed collections of legal opinions (fatwās) that he issued in specific years. He mentions collections for six years, but regrettably none of these seem to have survived.¹³⁹ In the field of medicine, Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī was solidly positioned in the field of prophetic medicine, that is medical practices ascribed to the Prophet and those mentioned in the Koran and ḥadīths, rather than those derived from Hellenistic medical systems.

When we look at Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's scholarly activities we see that his interests were not evenly distributed over the course of his life, but came and went. This is most evident in the field of medicine. His fibrīst contains only nine of his works in the field of medicine.¹⁴⁰ Yet, we have in the National al-Asad Library numerous medical works by him that are not mentioned in the fihrist.¹⁴¹ Virtually all these works were written after the year 901/1495–6 when Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, at this point some sixty years old, must have developed a strong interest in the field. One might also speculate as to whether the fact that he only mentions his collections of fatwās for the years 888/1483–4 to 894/1488–9 indicates an intensive ‘fiqh-period’ in his life when he was in his late forties/early fifties. We are on safer ground when trying to pin down his interest in ḥadīth. There is no doubt that his interest in this field started early in his life and continued right to the end.

However, we have an indication that he composed most of his works in this field in a rather short time period. For this we have to match two of his book lists, the fihrist that is at the heart of this book and the above-mentioned auto-bibliography, Naming my Books. I argue in Chapter 5 that this auto-bibliography was most likely written in the year 891/1486–7. Yet, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī continued to add titles of works that he must have written after this date to this alphabetically organised list. He certainly did so in the main text block as he had foreseen this scenario and had left blank spaces under each letter for future additions. In this case, it is very difficult to sort out those titles written before 891/1486–7 and those written after that year. However, for his ḥadīth works his forbearance proved insufficient as all their titles tend to start with a few letters, especially the letter alif, on account of his many collections of ‘forty ḥadīths’ (arba‘ ināt). In consequence, he had not left enough space for them and had to squeeze them into the margins. On Plate I.6 we see one page from the section on the letter alif, where he uses every space in the margins to cram in titles – and almost without exception these titles in the margins refer to works of ḥadīth. Thus it seems most likely that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī composed the majority of his ḥadīth titles after the year 891/1486–7. However, all these titles can be found in the fihrist, which was written, as will be argued below, around the year 897/1492. Consequently, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī had a particularly intensive period of engagement with ḥadīth in the period between 891/1486–7 and 897/1492, that is when he was in his fifties and shortly before he made his endowment.

We now have a rough idea what scholarly fields Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī took an interest in (and to some extent when) and it would help to underline what we do not find in his oeuvre. Apart from agriculture, he had no interest whatsoever in fields outside the transmitted or literary sciences, such as mathematics or astronomy. We have also seen that while he was at home with applied law he had no interest in the abstract field of uṣūl al-fiqh. Another area that seemed not to interest him was one of two ways in which scholars engaged with the bodies of transmission in his period: commentaries on ḥadīth (shurūḥ), that is works that interpret and reinterpret the meanings of these reports. These commentaries were, besides post-canonical ḥadīth scholarship, the main mode of how scholars engaged with ḥadīth. As Joel Blecher has shown, between the thirteenth and the sixteenth centuries the field of ḥadīth commentaries had its centre of gravity in Egypt and Syria, where numerous massive multi-volume commentaries were composed.¹⁴² Yet, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī showed little interest in this field, which was typically pursued by scholars of the Shāfi‘ī madhhab. His works on ḥadīth are mostly compilations of traditions with some comments thrown in, but none of his works was a fully fledged commentary.

Not very surprisingly for a scholar so at home with the transmitted sciences, theology was also not something he engaged in. As a Ḥanbali scholar he was averse to Ash‘ari theology with its emphasis on rational argumentation and its close links with the Shāfi‘ī school of law. He thus wrote treatises against ‘Alī Ibn ‘Asākir (d. 571/1176), the great Damascene ḥadīth scholar, which Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī liked, and Ash‘ari, which he liked much less. However, in these treatises he did not engage in detailed polemics over theological questions. Rather, works such as his Assembling the Armies (Jam‘ al-juyūsh wa-al-dasākir ‘alā Ibn ‘Asākir) are collections of transmissions that to a large extent are left to speak for themselves.¹⁴³

Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s teachers very much reflected what we have seen of his profile so far. If we take a look at how Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was remembered by his biographers we see that those teachers they mentioned come from the Ḥanbali community and are those who transmitted ḥadīth to him. For instance, al-Ghazzī, writing in the seventeenth century, exclusively mentions ḥadīth teachers. He names two of them, Niẓām al-Dīn ‘Umar Ibn Muflīḥ (d. 872/1467) and Fāṭima al-Ḥarastāniya, and adds that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī heard ḥadīths from those who had transmitted from earlier scholars, such as ‘Abd Allāh Ibn al-Muḥibb (d. 736/1336) and his ancestors ‘Ā’isha bt. ‘Abd al-Hādī.¹⁴⁴ The transmission notes on Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s manuscripts very neatly match these names and they occur over and over again. Overall, one does not get the impression that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was closely integrated in the high-profile scholarly networks of his time. He was certainly not on the margins, but the very narrow profile of his teachers and the fact that few are mentioned in his biographies indicate a rather middling position. This is corroborated by the absence of any scholarly travels except to Baalbek, which was not exactly the most vibrant scholarly hub of the Arabic Middle East. At this point Cairo, the undisputed intellectual centre in the region, was the place to go and to be a scholar. That Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī never set foot in the city is probably the most telling feature of his scholarly trajectory.

In consequence, it is also not very surprising that we know little about his students. His biographers do not mention any names and modern scholarship has only identified a short list that is again dominated by Ḥanbalis from Ṣāliḥiyya.¹⁴⁵ His manuscript notes are also rather weak in this regard and it is evident that his imprint on the following generation was weak. Those who feature most often in transmission notes are members of his family, especially his concubines and children. However, his concubines did not take up scholarly pursuits and his children did not turn out to be stellar scholars. His son Ḥasan is said to annually distribute meat on the occasion of a feast in the ‘Umarīya Madrasa, but he does not seem to have any other connection with this madrasa.¹⁴⁶ Short biographies were written about two of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s children, while his other family members are not traceable outside Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s manuscript notes. One of the two is ‘Abd al-Hādī (d. 911/1505), his oldest surviving son, who initially showed some interest in scholarly matters. However he sought greener pastures and pursued an administrative career working for the governor in Hama, where he died.¹⁴⁷ Likewise, another of his younger sons, ‘Alī (d. 930/1523) turned his back on scholarly matters and embarked on a life of travel.¹⁴⁸ Seven years before his death we find him back in the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter where he endows a garden for the benefit of a son called Yūsuf, as is evident from the early Ottoman registers.¹⁴⁹ This is the last we hear of the ‘Abd al-Hādī, and Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s offspring disappear from the written record in the course of the sixteenth century.

There is one major exception to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s weak imprint and that is his student Ibn Ṭūlūn, who, like his teacher, came from the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter. He went on to become an important figure in the Damascene scholarly landscape of his generation. He was not only a polymath, like Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, but also held numerous salaried positions in madrasas and mosques in the course of his life. In addition, Ibn Ṭūlūn also endowed his book collection into the same ‘Umariya Madrasa where he was, furthermore, the librarian.¹⁵⁰ The relationship between the two was so extraordinarily close, as we will see in the following chapter, that Ibn Ṭūlūn can be justifiably considered a member of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī household for some periods of his life. We have seen that he authored a (lost) biography of his teacher. More importantly, the young Ibn Ṭūlūn systematically participated in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s reading sessions and thus received permission (ijāza) to transmit most of his works. This is why Ibn Ṭūlūn heavily drew on his teacher’s works in his own oeuvre and we might call him the custodian of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s scholarly legacy. The best-known case of this is Ibn Ṭūlūn’s history of the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter, the Jewelled Necklaces, which absorbed Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s History of Ṣāliḥīya, as seen above. In a nutshell, if Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s work had an after-life, it was thanks to Ibn Ṭūlūn. However, there is one caveat to his role as custodian. Firstly, even though Ibn Ṭūlūn authored over 700 works, the vast majority have not survived. In fact, the survival rate of his works seems to be similar to that of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī.¹⁵¹ So although Ibn Ṭūlūn incorporated much of his teacher’s oeuvre into his own works, it still failed to find a major audience in subsequent years.

Damascene Ḥanbalism and Sufism

A scholarly interest that remained constant throughout Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s life was Sufism. Yet in modern secondary literature this Sufi aspect has been marginalised or fully obliterated. This is not surprising, as the renewed interest in his oeuvre was driven by a perception of him as a ‘traditionalist’ Ḥanbali scholar. Aspects of his life that were standard in his time, but are much less standard in Wahhābī-inflected versions of Ḥanbalism, have thus not been at the centre of scholarly interest. When such aspects are evident in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s works it is not unusual for modern editors to issue a word of warning to the reader. For instance, when Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī reports that he himself was initiated into the Qādiri order and received the initiation cloak (khirqā), the editor comments that all this is an ‘unlawful innovation’. Similarly, his reports on floating funeral biers are dismissed as ‘tales from the books of the extreme Sufis’.¹⁵²

It is by now well established that most Sufi discourses and practices were not deemed problematic per se in the Middle Period. Nathan Hofer has shown to what extent Sufism became popular across social and cultural distinctions in Ayyubid and early Mamluk Egypt.¹⁵³ The purported dichotomy between (traditionalist) scholars and Sufis has also been rejected for late Mamluk Damascus.¹⁵⁴ Even for the Ḥanbalis of Damascus, the world of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, scholarship has long since rejected the simplistic notion of Sufism versus traditionalist Ḥanbalism. Even though it remains disputed whether the most famous of all Damascene Ḥanbalis, Ibn Taymīya (d. 728/1328), was directly affiliated with a Sufi order,¹⁵⁵ it is at least evident that Sufism was very much present in his intellectual circle. One of his closest students,

More relevant for us here are the Ḥanbalis from the Šāliḥīya Quarter, especially the Maqdisīs. The charismatic piety prevalent in this community, clearly different from the world of Ibn Taymīya, emphasised the role of the individual shaykh. As Daniella Talmon-Heller has shown, the Banū Qudāma strove to depict themselves as originating from a pietistic community centred around shaykhs with distinctive Sufi inflections.¹⁵⁷ She bases her argument on three works on this community written by one of the most central figures of this family, Ḍiyā’ al-Dīn al-Maqdisī (d. 643/1245), and it is certainly not by chance that the very autograph of one of these ended up on Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s bookshelves.¹⁵⁸ We not only have texts that depict this community’s lineage in a Sufi-inflected way, but there is also direct evidence for much stronger links with Sufism: Ḍiyā’ al-Dīn’s uncle, Muwaffaq al-Dīn Ibn Qudāma al-Maqdisī (d. 620/1223), proudly declares that he received the cloak of initiation – again in a book that ended up on Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s bookshelves.¹⁵⁹

Against this background it seems rather self-evident that Sufism was an inextricable part of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s scholarly oeuvre and his scholarly practices. He was, as we have seen, without doubt initiated into the Qādiri order. That he opted for this order went back to the fact that its genesis in Syria in the thirteenth century was closely linked with Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s ancestors themselves, the Qudāma family.¹⁶⁰ His first initiation took place in Baalbek, the only town outside Damascus he ever travelled to, and the master who initiated him is only known from the very brief biography penned by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī himself. Tellingly, the only other relevant bit of information he furnishes about this Aḥmad al-Ba‘lī al-Ḥanbalī (d. 871/1466), apart from the initiation, is that he was a notary witness.¹⁶¹ In one of his works, Donning the Cloak (Lubs al-khirqa), Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī names two more masters with their lines of initiation besides that of al-Ba‘lī.¹⁶² In another copy of the same work he describes a fourth initiation by a certain Shihāb al-Dīn b. Zayd in the year 879/1465.¹⁶³ Just as we know that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī received the cloak we also know that he himself initiated disciples. We do not have many details on such initiations as they were certainly below the radar of the narrative sources that we have. However, in one samā’-note written by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī in the year 875/1471, when he was thirty-five years old, he states after the name of one of the participants, a certain Yūsuf al-Zar‘ī, that ‘he donned the cloak from me’. This note wonderfully illustrates that Sufism and traditionalist ḥadīth scholarship in the Ḥanbali vein were not at all at odds; this note proudly sits at the end of a book by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī on ḥadīth transmission.¹⁶⁴

As a consequence of his interest, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī authored several works on Sufism. In contrast to Ibn Taymīya’s student Ibn Qayyim al-Jawzīya (d. 751/1350), who skilfully employed the technical vocabulary of Sufism to convey a traditionalist message,¹⁶⁵ Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s works were indeed fully fledged Sufi works. In his biographical works we also see that key Sufi concepts such as wilāya (friendship with God) appear regularly. For instance, he narrates one of his dream visions that took place during his brother Aḥmad’s final illness, which proved to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī that his brother was a ‘friend of God’ (his bier also floated in the air).¹⁶⁶ Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was in no doubt whatsoever that his Sufism was fully in line with his Ḥanbali credentials. In one of his works he gives yet another line of initiation, which starts with his own initiation at the hand of his ḥadīth teacher (and Sufi master) Zayn al-Dīn ‘Umar al-Lu‘lu‘ī (d. 873/1468). It then runs through a genealogy of initiations with the grand seigneurs of Damascene Ḥanbalism (Ibn Rajab, Ibn Qayyim al-Jawzīya and Ibn Taymīya) to finally bring in the early Maqdisīs (Muwaffaq al-Dīn Ibn Qudāma al-Maqdisī and Abū ‘Umar).¹⁶⁷ Whether this line reflects any historical reality is of no importance whatsoever (and George Makdisi was probably too optimistic in that regard)¹⁶⁸ – the main point is that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s claim was sufficiently credible for this work to belong to the select few from his oeuvre that were copied.

In the present discussion of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s scholarly profile, there has been one elephant in the room, the inevitable Ibn Taymīya. The grandest of all Damascene Ḥanbali scholars, and perhaps of all Ḥanbali scholars anywhere, he casts a shadow on any discussion of Ḥanbalism in this period. However, as has become clear by now, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī belonged to a very different strand of Ḥanbalism, one that cannot be easily subsumed under Ibn Taymīya’s activist role in society and his at times controversial scholarly outlook. This sits well with new research that challenges the view of Ḥanbalism as being virtually synonymous with Ibn Taymīya in this period. Caterina Bori has shown that the number of close associates that constituted his circle (jamā‘a) was fairly low and not at all restricted to Ḥanbali scholars. More importantly, Damascene Ḥanbalis reacted to Ibn Taymīya with ‘fluctuating scepticism’, especially on account of his rejection of some Sufi practices, his penchant for speculative theology and his peculiar stances on numerous questions of law.¹⁶⁹

It is quite clear that a scholar who was comfortable with floating biers operated in quite a different scholarly world. There were clearly overlaps and the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection has ample titles authored by Ibn Taymīya: with eighty-six titles he is the best-represented author after Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī himself. However, these titles are mostly very brief treatises and well over half of the total can be found in just four codicological units.¹⁷⁰ Furthermore, it is striking that none of these titles fall within the main scope of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s collection, ḥadīth scholarship. This is because Ibn Taymīya’s contribution to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s most cherished scholarly field, post-canonical ḥadīth transmission, was marginal. If we take the Index of Damascene Audition Certificates, the best overview of the Damascene ‘golden age’ of ḥadīth, we see that Ibn Taymīya only participated in fifteen sessions – and he was the teacher (musmi') in one single session.¹⁷¹ This is in stark contrast with the Maqdisī heavyweights of that period. The above-mentioned Ḍiyā' al-Dīn al-Maqdisī, to take but one example, attends sixty sessions and at most of these he is the teacher.¹⁷² This Ḍiyā' al-Dīn is also very well represented in the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī collection with seventy titles, but he fits this collection much better as forty-six of his titles fall into the field of ḥadīth.

Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's world of post-canonical ḥadīth transmission was located in the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter on Mount Qāsyūn with its sprawling number of Ḥanbali institutions. Yet Ibn Taymīya had few connections with this Ḥanbali ecosystem. At least, Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's contemporary, al-Nu'aymī, has little to say about Ibn Taymīya in his work on Damascene institutions of teaching. More significantly for our purposes, everything that he does have to say about him takes place within the walls of the city and is not linked with the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter and its institutions.¹⁷³ What we have with Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī is thus a line of scholarship and a social context that is distinctively different from what is today generally associated with Damascene Ḥanbalism. The Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī collection and what it was meant to do can only be understood against this background. And in the next chapter we will turn to this collection to understand its 'monumental' significance in late medieval Damascus.

Monumentalising the Past

The year is 1878. Officials of the state's new endowment administration are knocking and kicking on the door of the 'Umarīya Madrasa, but to no avail. The madrasa's administrator (nāzīr) bluntly refuses to let them in as he knows what these men are after: the books. Finally, they bring in gendarmerie officers to force the door open. Entering the library, they find a desolate picture. Most of the shelves are empty as the prescient administrator has already removed what he considered to be the choice books. All they find are 620 volumes, in addition to unbound quires and loose pages. Yet, even removing this material proves difficult as getting in was one thing, but getting the books out another: the porters they require have all vanished into thin air at the instigation of the same administrator. In the end, the officials have no choice but to hire the quarter's rubbish collectors to move the books. The books of the 'Umarīya Madrasa thus depart their home for many centuries in the most unbecoming manner. Stuffed into rubbish bags and carried by mules they leave Mount Qāsyūn.¹

The background to these dramatic events was the foundation of a new Public Library (al-maktaba al-'umūmiyya) in which the books of all Damascene 'old' endowment libraries were henceforth to be housed. This watershed in the history of the city's endowment libraries goes back to the arrival of Miḍhat Pasha (1822–84) as the governor of the Syrian province in the same year: 1878. Miḍhat Pasha was one of the central figures in the drastic reform process that the Ottoman Empire had undergone in the previous decades. Not only had he held the grand vizierate in Istanbul, but he was also a seasoned regional governor who had left a discernible footprint in Iraq.

He was to stay in Damascus for fewer than two years, but these were rather intensive months that left a deep imprint on administrative structures and fiscal matters. In addition he continued the urban transformation of previous years with the construction of new roads, one of them connecting Şālīḥīya and Damascus.² One of the focus areas of late Ottoman reform was the educational and cultural field, where we see the introduction of new institutions and new educational practices.³

While Midhat Pasha was only one of a string of governors who oversaw the transformation of Syria and Damascus, his term is uniquely important for the cultural field. After he arrived in Damascus, he immediately formed a Benevolent Committee (jam'īya khayrīya) that was to look after all things educational and cultural, including libraries. This committee worked at impressive speed and submitted a report on the city's libraries within a few months.⁴ On the basis of this report, a decree was promptly issued that had three aims: delegitimise the existing libraries as inefficient and sloppy; dissolve these 'old' libraries; and move these libraries' books into a newly created modern Public Library.⁵ The story of this dramatic shift in the book culture in Damascus and elsewhere – part of a much wider transformation of the past becoming musealised and books becoming manuscripts – as well as the role of other protagonists in Damascus, especially that of Ṭāḥir al-Jazā'irī (1852–1920), remains to be written and this is regrettably not the place to do so. The relevant point here is that a decision was made to start with ten book collections and the 'Umarīya was one of them. The librarians in the new Public Library duly produced a hand-written catalogue (still organised according to the original libraries), which gives fascinating insights into the work-in-progress of a 'modern' library in the making and its spatial organisation (the new library had for instance ten cabinets [dūlāb]).⁶ Two years later, in 1299/1881–2, the first printed catalogue of the new library was published

Scholarship has hardly used this catalogue to date. Carl Brockelmann referred to it in his Geschichte der arabischen Litteratur and the new English translation retained his references to the Ottoman-period Public Library as 'Dam. 'Um.', though it is unclear how many readers will make the link to the current National al-Asad Library in Damascus and its new classmarks.⁷ Few copies of this catalogue are held in European libraries and that the British Library found a copy of this catalogue in their 'backlog' more than a century after it was purchased might have contributed to its rather limited impact so far.⁸

Returning to late Ottoman Damascus, the holdings of the only library that stretched back to the Mamluk period and that made its way into the Public Library was that of the 'Umariya Madrasa. And here we come to Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī, because of the 620 books that the Sublime Register marked with the provenance 'Umariya', the vast majority were books that none other than Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī had endowed some 400 years earlier. This was not a foregone conclusion because, as we will see further down, Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī was only one of scores of scholars who endowed their books into the 'Umariya Library in the 700 years between its foundation and dissolution. The new Public Library had a total of 2,464 books from the various libraries, so around a quarter of its entire holdings came via the 'Umariya Madrasa from the shelves of Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's home.⁹ This means that the majority of its pre-Ottoman manuscripts were books that Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī had once owned. In other words, the founding stock of the modern manuscript library of Damascus, and ultimately Syria, was, as far as the Mamluk period is concerned, shaped by the library project of a solitary scholar in the late medieval period.

This new Public Library went through several permutations in the course of the past 120 years and became known as the Zāhiriya Library and today as the National al-Asad Library.¹⁰ Its holdings significantly increased over the years, especially by absorbing collections from other Syrian cities, to close to 20,000 entries today, yet the imprint of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī is still written all over it. To take but one example: we have previously seen the Index of Damascene Audition Certificates, which indexes and reproduces over 1,300 manuscript notes from the Ayyubid and Mamluk periods from the National al-Asad Library. Yet if we look at the manuscripts that were used for this index, we see that an impressive 94 per cent of all notes come from manuscripts that had been part of one single collection – the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection.¹¹ In a sense, this work is thus rather the Index of Damascene Audition Certificates According to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī.

The key role of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī in preserving what we see today in the National al-Asad Library and in what we know about manuscript culture in medieval Damascus might seem not that surprising in a book that is dedicated to this scholar and his books. However, one must not forget that there were many libraries in Damascus during the pre-Ottoman period and that there were other scholars who endowed their books to these madrāsas. That Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s project was so influential raises two major questions. First, we have to understand the intention of his project in order to historicise the extant Mamluk-period manuscript heritage in Damascus and to ask how its cultural significance set it apart from its peers. To answer this question not only allows us to read Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s collection as a conscious project of monumentalising what was for him the glorious past of his hometown, but it also brings out the extent to which the modern-day manuscript libraries in which we work are deeply shaped by such medieval library projects. Second, in the following chapters we will turn to the question of how this one project succeeded where hundreds of other medieval book endowments ultimately failed – to create a long-lasting book collection that survived as a corpus.

Building up a Book Collection in Late Medieval Damascus

Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī wrote little about how he actually built up his book collection in practical terms: from whom he bought books, where he bought them and what prices he paid. Nor can we glean much information from other scholars of his period to provide a comparative case. Yet, even though he did not explicitly write about how he obtained his books, there are sufficient traces in his manuscript corpus to piece together most of the story. These traces are less numerous than those we have for Ottoman-period collectors, such as Cârullah Efendi, where we are able to follow the build-up of his collection over time. In his case we see a scholar who travelled widely through the provinces of the Ottoman Empire and who noted down many of his purchases with dates, so we often know what he bought in Cairo, Mecca, Baghdad, Diyarbakir or Damascus.¹² In Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s case, all dates have to be deduced and we are on far less secure ground. Yet, it is clear that his story is a much more local story of a carefully and very consciously built-up collection that came from various sources in Damascus, such as markets, inheritances and public auctions.

Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī came from a scholarly household where books were passed down through inheritance and we thus find on some books the following statement: ‘Yūsuf Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, by the grace of my Lord, took ownership of this book from the books of his father.’¹³ In the same vein, we find in his collection ownership statements by his father Ḥasan on books that most likely passed to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī by inheritance as well: ‘It went into the ownership of its [the note’s] writer, Ḥasan b. ‘Abd al-Hādī, by a sale in conformity with the sharī‘a.’¹⁴ The number of father-to-son notes is limited, but this in itself should not be taken as proof that it only happened in a few cases. For instance, in the preface of his work Ten ḥadīths Selected from my Father’s Transmissions (al-‘Ashara al-mukhtāra min marwīyāt wālidi) he states that he was inspired to put together this compilation when he witnessed his father reading al-Dārimī’s Collection of ḥadīths with Three Intermediaries to the Prophet (Thulāthiyāt al-Dārimī) to his mother. And indeed, we do find this booklet in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection, but without an ownership note.¹⁵ However, there is an indicator that shows that the number of inherited books was not that large. As we have seen, the vast majority of the books in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection were from the field of ḥadīth. These books carry thousands of manuscript notes in the shape of audition certificates in which the teacher transmits the right to teach a specific text to his student(s). As is well known, it was common practice to take one’s children to such reading sessions and to have them participate in one’s own sessions. Yet, there is little indication on Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s ḥadīth books that his father gave him the right to transmit them. This would have surely been the case had these books resided in his father’s house before being passed down.

Much more common for Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī were book purchases, and examination of them shows that he consciously built up his library over the course of his life until his mid-fifties. There is strong evidence that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī took advantage of his job as notary witness to buy directly from the estates of deceased book owners. For instance, when he drew up the document to settle the estate of Shaykh ‘Umar, mentioned in Chapter 1, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī bought one of the books on offer for himself. A notary witness who settles an estate by public auction and is then personally involved in this sale sounds potentially dubious. However, the paperwork conveys a sense of propriety as the son of the deceased son explicitly acknowledges that he received all monies owed by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī.¹⁶ Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī also bought books at public sales of estates for which he was not the notary witness. This practice is evident from his writings when he mentions in the biography of one of his teachers that he bought a commentary in two volumes from his estate.¹⁷ In the light of his estate purchases, other manuscript notes saying that a book went into his ownership ‘from the books of’ can be read as similar purchases.¹⁸

In this case, he also bought from the estates of his own relatives, such as his cousins.¹⁹

There is no doubt that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was also a customer at the Damascene book markets, though there is little direct evidence for this in terms of manuscript notes or other sources. When he states in his catalogue that one of his books ‘cost me 500 [Dirham] on account of Shaykh ‘Abd al-Qādir’s script’ on it, one can assume that this was a market purchase.²⁰ The main book markets (Map 2.1) were in proximity to Damascus’ spiritual intramural centre, the Umayyad Mosque, and the most important of them was in the Kallāsa Quarter to the north of the mosque. This was a well-established market in one of the city’s most bookish areas that had existed at least since the Ayyubid period.²¹ A further book market was on the mosque’s western side, the Bāb al-Barīd, where we also find the book-binders’ market (sūq al-mujallidīn) and the paper market (sūq al-warrāqīn) in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s time.²² In addition, the Šālīḥīya Quarter housed its own paper market, the only Damascene quarter to do so, though the evidence for this is rather sparse.²³ Yet, it can be assumed that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī had opportunities to purchase books without having to go down into the walled city.

While we cannot track any specific purchases at these established markets, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī noted on one of his booklets that its purchase, and that of other such items, was made at a rather surprising market, namely the trinket market (sūq al-saqatīya).²⁴ Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī mentions this market for cast-offs in his own treatise on the Damascene markets as being located in the extra-mural suburb Taḥt al-qal‘a (Below the Citadel), an area where many markets had their home.²⁵ This area was the most important royal ceremonial zone in the early fourteenth century.²⁶ Yet, it must have undergone quite a change as in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s time it was, in the words of al-Badrī (d. 909/1503), a place crowded with ‘rogues/villains, comedians, frauds and story tellers. There was everything which was a pleasure to the eye and the ear.’²⁷ Apart from being a pleasantly rowdy place, this suburb was also conveniently located on Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s route from his home in The Upper Lot to the city walls.

²³ Ibn Ḥajar al-‘Asqalānī, al-Durar, VI, p. 85 speaks of a shop owner ‘bi-al-warrāqīn bi-al-Šālīḥīya’, though this refers to the eighth/fourteenth century.

The purchase of booklets on the trinket market is highly significant for understanding Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s monumentalisation project, as we will see in the next chapter. On this market, books were not sold as books – this would be done more profitably on the Kallāsa or the Bāb al-Barīd book markets. Rather, books on offer here were on the brink of the last stage in their life cycle and would normally have been sold on the paper market to be reused. The existence of such reuse practices is well known from works such as the fourteenth-century normative treatise by the Egyptian author Ibn al-Ḥājj (d. 737/1336). Here, he explicitly refers to such paper being pulped. He states, however, that not everything was to be pulped and he explicitly censured those who sold for this purpose paper with Koranic text, ḥadīths and the names of God, the prophets and the angels.²⁸ The ḥadīth books offered on the trinket markets below the citadel thus had an uneasy in-between status: they were no longer for the book market yet because of their content they could also not be sold off as scrap paper. They thus ended up on a market that was not previously on our radar for book trading in Damascus. Considering the shabby appearance of many books in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s collection it is quite likely that he bought many of these in-between books on the trinket market.

We do not know the stages in which Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī built up his book collection as the manuscript notes are not dated. However, we do know that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī wrote a list on his collection as he mentions in his fihrist a Titles of the Books Owned by Me (Asmā’ al-kutub al-mamlūka li).²⁹ He calls it a safīna, which means that it was oblong-shaped and bound at the top or bottom of the folia with the lines running horizontal to the spine. This was thus not a ‘proper’ book, but rather a ‘notebook’ and examples of such safīna-shaped notebooks include the well-known fourteenth-century Notebook (Tadhkira) by al-Ṣafādī.³⁰ As this title is not mentioned in his auto-bibliographical Naming my Books it must have been written after the year 891/1486–7 and thus shortly before the fihrist. This list is lost, but as it was written not long before the fihrist it would probably not give much additional insight into the timeline of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s book ownership. What we do have is a note in which he mentions the transfer of his properties to his sons, which not only includes lands, but also his books.³¹ By the year 884/1479, in his mid-forties, he thus already owned a book collection that was valuable enough to be gifted to his offspring.

We can also safely assume that his book collection was well known, as people quite frequently borrowed books from it. This is evident from yet another set of his lists that he bound into his books, book-lending lists.³² These have exactly the same layout as the ‘inda-accounts’ that we saw in Chapter 1, lists of individuals who owed him money. In these book-lending lists the name is followed by the title of the book and they are also clearly work in progress as many entries are crossed out, presumably after the book was returned (Plate I.7 is one such example). Among those who took the books out we see relatives and close acquaintances, but also quite prominent members of the Damascene society, such as judges. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s library was certainly not a commercial lending library like those of late eighteenth-century/early nineteenth-century Damascus. Here, for example, Aḥmad al-Rabbāṭ had a book collection ranging from coffee-house to highbrow literature from which individuals from all strata of Damascene society could borrow books for a fee.³³ Nonetheless, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s lending lists are a clear indication that his relatively substantial library was an integral part of the Damascene reading landscape.

The Profile of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī Book Collection

While we thus have some insight how Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī built up his library but only limited insight into its role within the city, we do know a lot about the final result of his book-collecting activities. With the fihrist we have a very substantial and detailed list that enables us to comprehend the library’s thematic profile. The catalogue itself is not thematically organised, so the following discussion is based on thematic categories that I have ascribed to these works (in my book on the Ashrafiya catalogue they are called ‘external thematic categories’ as that catalogue had its own thematic organisation).³⁴ There are two caveats to this ascription. Firstly, many works have not come down to us and are not known from other sources, so such thematic ascriptions are far from self-evident. Secondly, reducing the thematic breadth of works into one single term is an inexact science as many works are encyclopaedic or at least highly heterogeneous. Having said that, as heuristic tools such thematic categories are helpful in order to get some understanding of what fields this collection covered and it was possible to ascribe a thematic category to some 87 per cent of all titles.

The first and main point to underline when it comes to the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection is that the field of ḥadīth takes first place. Almost two-thirds of all titles (for exact numbers see Table 2.1) are linked with this one single field. Way behind with 10 per cent comes law, followed by history at 6 per cent. With 4.5 per cent, paraenesis is as insignificant as theology with 4 per cent. This is a strikingly different profile from the other Mamluk library that is documented with a catalogue, the Ashrafiya Library.³⁵ Here, ḥadīth was one of the most insignificant fields of knowledge with a mere 3 per cent of the titles. In first place, by contrast, with one-third of the titles was poetry, of which there is less than 1 per cent in the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī collection. While the reader could find the Dīwān al-Ṣabāba of the Mamluk poet Ibn Abī Ḥajala (d. 776/1375) in the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī collection,³⁶ there is not a single poetic work by Ibn Nubāta (d. 768/1366), who has emerged in recent years as a crucial figure of Mamluk-period poetry.³⁷ Moreover, all those scores of collections of pre-Islamic and early Islamic poetry that the Ashrafiya stocked simply did not exist in the fibrīst, except for some isolated cases (see entries number 169b and 233e). In other words, we have two documented large-scale endowed book collections from the Mamluk period for a single city, which is as dense a documentation as we get for the pre-Ottoman period. Yet these two ‘Islamic’ or ‘Mamluk’ book collections shared few thematic fields and existed in very different intellectual universes.

That ḥadīth was so dominant is a reflection of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s main field of scholarship during his fifties, when he endowed his books. As we have seen, his way of dealing with ḥadīth was deeply steeped in the world of post-canonical ḥadīth transmission. In textual terms, this line of scholarship was characterised by the dominance of short collections of ḥadīths, small-scale collections for which the statement that ḥadīth literature ‘is far more ephemeral than one would perhaps like’ is particularly pertinent.³⁸ The most well-known genre was that of a collection of ‘forty ḥadīths’ (arba‘ ināṭ) organised around a colourful range of criteria, such as sharing the same theme (for instance jihād) and/or the same transmitters (for instance all transmitted to the compiler by the same teacher) and/or transmitted in the same city/village and/or transmitted by a chain of scholars all carrying the same name and/or all having a specific number of transmitters between the compiler and the Prophet (such as the thulāthīyāt, that is three transmitters) and so on. There were also collections of five, ten, twenty or eighty ḥadīths (to cite the most frequent).

In some cases, an individual selection criterion for ḥadīths became so popular that these works emerged as a ‘genre’ in their own right. There is also some overlap between genres, for example works that fall into a ‘criterion-based genre’ could also have forty ḥadīths. Thus, it fell to the compiler to decide whether or not he wanted to emphasise the number of ḥadīths in a collection’s title. For instance, we have the genre of buldānīyāt, that is collections of ḥadīths transmitted in the same city/village, but as we have just seen a work with a set number of ḥadīths could also be organised around the very same criterion. Particularly prominent further criterion-based genres were those of ‘awālī’ (‘high ḥadīths’, that is a collection of those ḥadīths for which a scholar had remarkably short lines of transmission), muṣāfaḥa (‘shaking hands’, that is with a line of transmission with only one more transmitter than the compiler of an authoritative work) and muwāfaqāt (‘being in agreement’, that is having the same line of transmission as an author of an authoritative work, but to one of his contemporaries).³⁹ We still know relatively little about the development of these genres, but Mohammad Gharaibeh has suggested that these post-canonical collections were initially very much a phenomenon of Iraq and the lands farther east until they started to appear in the course of the twelfth century in Syria and Egypt.⁴⁰

In the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection we see indeed that an overwhelming majority of the works in the field of ḥadīth belong to such post-canonical ḥadīth collections – these works constitute by far the largest cluster of works in his collection. This can be exemplified by looking at the case of al-Bukhārī, the compiler of one of the two most authoritative ‘canonical’ Sunni ḥadīth collections, the Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī. Against all expectations what we do not find in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s book collection is precisely this book. We thus have here the case of a large-scale library that is centred on the field of ḥadīth to such an extent that one can say that its raison d’être is nothing but this field; yet, its user would not find the best-known, the most authoritative book on its shelves. One might argue that this book was so important that it was not even part of the standard collection. The transmission of ḥadīth was not only a scholarly activity, but reading them out had also become part and parcel of rituals so we increasingly find the recitation of authoritative works such as al-Bukhārī as an independent ritual. In consequence, such works, like the Koran, could have had a separate physical location outside the library. However, this argument does not work in the case of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī as not only does he have the other highly authoritative ḥadīth collection on his shelves, the Ṣaḥīḥ Muslim, but also three copies of the Koran.⁴¹

The absence of a physical copy of Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī does not mean that al-Bukhārī’s oeuvre as a transmitter of ḥadīth was absent, rather we find it in its reconfigured post-canonical shape. Thus what we do find on the shelves are selections from al-Bukhārī’s work in numbered and criterion-based small-scale booklets. To these belong first and foremost the usual suspects such as the numbered Forty ḥadīths Selected from al-Bukhārī and ³⁹ Gharaibeh, Einführung is a helpful overview of post-canonical ḥadīth scholarship and the resulting emergence of new genres.

Forty ḥadīths With Short isnāds Selected from al-Bukhārī. There is also a slightly apologetic work that explains the low profile of the Ḥanbali madh-hab's founder Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal in the Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī, What al-Bukhārī Transmitted from Aḥmad [b. Ḥanbal] and the Reason They Are Few. In addition, there are two copies of a thulāthīyāt work, The ḥadīths with Three Transmitters Between al-Bukhārī and the Prophet, a 'awālī work Ḥadīth With Short isnāds from al-Bukhārī and finally a surprisingly oddly numbered Eleven ḥadīths from the One Hundred al-Bukhārī ḥadīths. In addition, we find three commentaries (shurūḥ), a strikingly high number of commentary works for Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's collection, which interpret the Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī.⁴²

Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī was not only an avid collector of such post-canonical collections, but he was also extraordinarily active as a compiler in his own right. He claimed to have written no fewer than 400 collections of forty ḥadīths alone⁴³ – though this round number should perhaps not be taken at face value. We are on safer ground when looking at his extant oeuvre and the number is still impressive. Among his own works in the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī collection for which a thematic category could be determined, 58 per cent are post-canonical collections. Among his works we find gems such as Forty ḥadīths with One Line of Transmission, Twenty ḥadīths with One Line of Transmission, Forty ḥadīths with Two Lines of Transmission, Forty ḥadīths with Four Lines of Transmission, Seven ḥadīths with Lines of Transmission from Father to Son, Forty ḥadīths with All Transmitters Called Muḥammad, Forty ḥadīths with All Transmitters Being Judges and so on.⁴⁴ This overall middling scholar was clearly the last great representative of this vanishing line of scholarship in Damascus and one of the last representatives in the wider Middle East.⁴⁵

Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was particularly interested in compiling ḥadīth collections that have a topographical bent in that they bring together ḥadīths transmitted in one specific place, the buldānīyāt.⁴⁶ What is more, in the case of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī these collections are entirely centred on Damascus and its agricultural hinterland, the Ghūṭa – not too surprising for a scholar whose geographical horizons did not stretch much further. Such Damascus-centred ḥadīth collections had existed previously and Ibn ‘Asākir, a scholar whose ḥadīth scholarship Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī respected, had written dozens of such works some 300 years earlier. However, since then the genre of Damascus-centred topographical ḥadīth compilations had not gained much popularity. In came Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, who authored dozens of ḥadīth compilations transmitted in and around Damascus, such as the Ten [ḥadīths] of Birza (a village to the north of Damascus), the Ten [ḥadīths] of Bayt Lihyā (a village to the east), the Five [ḥadīths] of al-Nayrab (a village to the west), the Six [ḥadīths] of al-Hāma (a village to the north-west) and so the list continues.⁴⁷ That Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī revived the Damascus and Ghūṭa-centred genres of buldānīyāt was noted by his contemporaries. His student Ibn Ṭūlūn writes for instance that his teacher was the first scholar since Ibn ‘Asākir to devote a booklet to the traditions of the village of Ḥurdān.⁴⁸ For other villages Ibn Ṭūlūn faithfully mentions that his teacher composed yet another booklet on their traditions.⁴⁹

However, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s real historical importance does not lie in his compilership, but rather in him collecting so many earlier post-canonical ḥadīth booklets that reflect this line of scholarship in its specifically Damascene, and to a large extent really Ḥanbali-Ṣāliḥīya, bent. The fiercely parochial profile of his collection is also evident when we look at what is not there: Muḥyī al-Dīn al-Nawawī (d. 676/1277) was arguably the most important scholar of ḥadīth commentary in his age, yet we only find two short fragments of this Damascene Shāfi‘i scholar’s works in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection.⁵⁰ A generation earlier, Damascus was home to another crucial ḥadīth scholar, Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ al-Shahrazūrī (d. 643/1245), who authored the classic and comprehensive textbook for the study of ḥadīth, Introduction to the Sciences of Ḥadīth (al-Muqaddima or Kitāb Ma‘rifat anwā‘ ‘ilm al-ḥadīth).⁵¹ Despite the pivotal importance of this work in Damascus over the following centuries, as shown by Mohammad Gharaibeh, there is not the slightest trace of this Shāfi‘i author’s work in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection.⁵² One gets the sense of two universes of ḥadīth scholarship existing in parallel within Damascus: on the one hand the Ḥanbali-Ṣalīḥiyya group that centred its scholarly practices on small booklets and on the other hand the Shāfi‘i group that focused on the commentary tradition.

The pages of the books Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collected overflow with transmission notes wherein we see all the great scholars of Ṣalīḥiyya Ḥanbalism reading, listening and writing. These notes are also written testimony to the scholarly and sacred landscape of the quarter. Over and over again we see its three main landmarks, the ‘Umarīya Madrasa, the Ḍiyā’iyya Madrasa/Dār al-Ḥadīth and the Muẓaffarī Mosque, as sites of reading sessions. There is no other archive for this world of scholarship as dense as these notes, of which there are likely to be more than 10,000 (some 1,300 of which have been indexed in the Index of Damascene Audition Certificates). Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī thus built here a carefully profiled book collection that was meant to do something, namely to serve as a remembrance of bygone times of a line of scholarship that was about to disappear.

Reviving Orally Transmitted Books

The urgency of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s monumentalisation project becomes clear when looking at how he received the authorisation to transmit the ḥadīth booklets in his collection. With the rise of post-canonical ḥadīth scholarship and its distinct emphasis on oral and direct transmission, transmission notes had started to appear in large numbers. In recent years the field of Middle Eastern history has got used to the term ‘samā’ for these notes, which emphasises the oral character of transmission. However, this term downplays the function of these notes as ‘ijāza’, that is as a licence for all those present at the reading – irrespective of considerations such as age, gender, unfree status or profession – to transmit the work’s contents in future. In the post-canonical ḥadīth collections we thus find an (ideally) uninterrupted chain of such transmission notes that document how the licence to transmit was handed down the generations. This protocol of transmission notes is highly intricate and scholars such as Said Aljoumani have only now started to unpack it. For instance, when a new copy of a work was produced, the original manuscript’s notes could be condensed into brief riwāya (transmission) statements on the new manuscript’s title page or they might be copied over in abridged form as copied transmission notes.⁵³

What matters for us here is that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī faced a huge problem when he took ownership of the ḥadīth booklets. While the notes wonderfully flow from the point the manuscripts were produced (generally in the twelfth or thirteenth century), they peter out some one hundred years before Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s lifetime. Now, a post-canonical ḥadīth booklet without a continuous chain of transmission down to yourself is pretty useless. The textual material, the ḥadīths, were to a large extent drawn from the grand collections of the likes of al-Bukhārī and Muslim anyway. If you wanted to use such ḥadīths in, let’s say, a work of law, nobody required you to have a licence to transmit them. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s problem was thus that he owned books that did not generally carry what should have been there to make them ‘alive’: a continuous chain of transmission notes to himself.

To exemplify this let us take a ḥadīth booklet with the prosaic title Juz’ al-Ḥawrānī (al-Ḥawrānī’s Booklet).⁵⁴ This is a typical post-canonical ḥadīth collection of no more than eight folia of actual text, but with nine further folia carrying some forty transmission notes before and after the text. This booklet brings together a collection of ḥadīths transmitted by Muḥammad b. Ḥumayd al-Ḥawrānī (d. 341/952–3) and the actual copy on Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s shelves was written in the early thirteenth century in Damascus by Muḥammad Ibn Hāmil al-Ḥarrānī (d. 671/1273). It kicks off on the title page (folio 64a) with a copied transmission note that links this new booklet with the earlier line of transmission of the original manuscript from which the new booklet was copied. We find similar copied notes at the end of the text (folio 73a). The next eight notes are the ones in which the copyist himself receives licences to transmit the work from different authorities, obviously almost all of them Maqdisīs (folia 73b to 74b). In this way Ibn Hāmil ‘activates’ the copy with numerous prestigious lines of transmission and we see that he even takes the booklet to Aleppo for this purpose (folio 74b). The final set of notes shows how the text circulated in the Damascene scholarly scene with numerous readings up to the year 743/1342 held in Ṣāliḥīya, the Old City and other Damascene quarters. After that year there is dead silence and the booklet ceased to be used. This booklet was thus intensively transmitted from the point it was written in the year 637/1239 for a century until 743/1342. Its life cycle as an active agent in the scholarly landscape of Damascus ended at this point. This case is not a one-off or an exception. Rather, this is typical of the thousands of post-canonical Damascene ḥadīth booklets known to us. Some were written earlier, some were in circulation longer, some had fewer transmission notes, some had even more – but almost all of them ended their active scholarly life cycle in the fourteenth century. These manuscripts are not timeless witnesses of ḥadīth transmission. Rather, they have a very specific history: they bear witness to the golden age of post-canonical ḥadīth transmission in one city, Damascus, and their broken chains of transmission are evidence of the end of this age.

What these manuscripts also share is further transmission notes that suddenly pop up some one hundred years later – transmission notes that inevitably involve Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī. In the case of al-Ḥawrānī’s Booklet, this is a note in his hand – these notes are almost without exception in his hand – that records a session in which Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī reads the work to the scholar Fāṭima al-Ḥarastāniya (folio 63a, Plate I.8) and he thus receives the licence to transmit it. And we typically have a further note on these manuscripts, the one in which Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī reads the work to members of his household – he is also always reading in these sessions – who thus in turn receive the right to transmit it. These notes are again always in the hand of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī and virtually all readings took place – for a reason to be seen in the next section – in the year 897/1492. In the case of the Ibn Hāmīl booklet (Plate I.8; the note is at the bottom of the page), he read the text in that year to his two sons ‘Abd Allāh and Ḥasan as well as his concubine Bulbul (the second). And the final shared feature of these booklets is that after these two sets of notes by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī there is silence up to the present day.

This particular feature of Damascene ḥadīth booklets is not evident from the Index of Damascene Audition Certificates, which does not record notes written after the mid-fourteenth century. Before looking into the manuscripts, I was unsure what this chronological limitation of the Index meant for our understanding of the culture of ḥadīth transmission in the city. Was there a lot of material that had not been indexed? The answer is yes and no. The Index does indeed cover the bulk of notes that were on the manuscripts the editors decided to include (though we are never told according to what criteria the vast majority of manuscripts in Damascus was excluded). In that sense, drawing a line in the mid-fourteenth century makes perfect sense. However, this line obliterated the moment in these manuscripts’ life cycles when Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī appears on the scene – a moment that is crucial to understanding why and in what physical form they have survived.

The manuscript notes in which Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī receives the licence to transmit the works are highly unusual when looking at them from the vantage point of the heyday of post-canonical ḥadīth transmission. As there is no evidence as to how the respective teacher named in the note received her or his licence, these notes are quite bold and largely unsubstantiated claims. Transmitting these booklets was no longer central to scholarship and it is probable that very few people cared about what Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was doing. There is no evidence of how his teachers received their licences as there are hardly any notes involving them. It is particularly noteworthy that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī received all his licences from an extraordinarily narrow set of teachers: the names of Fāṭima al-Ḥarastāniya, Ibn al-Sharīfa and Niẓām al-Dīn appear over and over again. The most likely scenario is that these scholars had received general licences that did not require attendance at specific sessions.⁵⁵

⁵⁵ For the historical development of the ijāza see Davidson, Carrying on the Tradition.

Such general licences had been well established for centuries and Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī could certainly rely on them without doing anything uncomely. We know, for instance, that he himself received ijāzas from Cairene scholars whom he had never met.⁵⁶ He most likely received them by correspondence and that was perfectly fine according to post-canonical standards of transmission. Yet such general licences were clearly not highly popular in Damascus during the heyday of post-canonical ḥadīth transmission, as is evident from the thousands of very specific manuscript notes. To translate such general licences so systematically into the much more specific form of the transmission note, as Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī did, was clearly something very peculiar.

It is striking that the sessions in which Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī received an ijāza from these teachers for a specific text were small-scale affairs in which normally no more than two or three other scholars participated. A typical case is a reading with Niẓām al-Dīn in the year 865/1461, when Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was some twenty-five years old. He participated with two of his brothers and two other scholars, one of whom came with his daughter and a freed slave (mawlā).⁵⁷ In many cases these sessions are even smaller and in a typical reading session with Fāṭima al-Ḥarastānīya, for instance, only his three-year-old son, ‘Abd al-Raḥmān, is present (Plate I.8). The impression of a high degree of intimacy is corroborated by cases where he states that the reading took place in the house of his teacher Ibn al-Sharīfa ‘and I am with him on his seat (sarīr)’⁵⁸ or when the reading session with Niẓām al-Dīn had to be broken off ‘because of the Shaykh’s drowsiness and him often falling asleep’.⁵⁹

It is exceedingly rare to come across the crowded sessions that were characteristic of Damascene post-canonical ḥadīth culture in the golden age. The rare and outstanding example is a session from the year 863/1459, when Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was in his early twenties and he read a text to one of his favourite teachers, Ibn al-Sharīfa, in the presence of more than fifty participants.⁶⁰ However, the numbers might have been so high because this was not just a standard ḥadīth collection, but a biography of the Prophet (sīra). That Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī rarely received ijāzas in such public contexts is evident from his own practices of writing down notes: In a booklet that actually does have a transmission note for him when he was nine years old, he not only directs the reader’s attention to this note on the title page, but also emphasises it in his own transmission notes written some fifty years later.⁶¹

Overall, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s quest to receive ijāzas by actually reading the work to a teacher was not received with great interest in the Damascene society of his day. Repeatedly one gets an impression of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī making his lonely rounds in Ṣālīḥīya to bring newly acquired booklets to life by seeking out teachers who had general licences to transmit them. His notes, in general, are not overflowing with detail, so we get little idea of the nuts and bolts of where and when readings took place – again quite a difference to the standard, Damascene, post-canonical transmission notes where the date is always stated and often the place too.

Yet, sometimes we do get some insights, for instance when he got hold of a ḥadīth booklet written in the late twelfth century in Damascus. As it was full of post-canonical transmission notes, clearly he must have been excited. He thus went to one of his preferred teachers, Fāṭima al-Ḥarastānīya, and read it to her. On the same day, as he duly noted, he went to his other preferred teacher, Ibn al-Sharīfa, and read it also to him.⁶² The other notes on his claims to rights of transmission in the same booklet also do not give the impression that his readings were in any way similar to those vivid events documented in all these earlier transmission notes. The absence of detail might go back to the fact that he wrote at least some of these notes some time after the actual moment of transmission. In one note he states, for instance, that he is no longer sure whether he ‘heard some or all of it’⁶³ – again a statement that would have raised eyebrows in thirteenth-century Damascus. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī kept ‘diaries’ of his readings – we find remnants of one such list as reused scrap paper in one of his works – but they do not offer much in the way of detail. He thus notes that a certain Muḥammad gave him an ijāza for ‘a booklet (juzʿ)’ or that a certain ‘Ā’isha (no further details are provided) gave him an ijāza ‘from Aleppo’ (again, no details on the date or the text[s] for which the ijāza was granted are provided).⁶⁴

In most cases an actual reading of the booklet did not take place and what we find on most booklets owned by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī are thus not fully fledged samāʿ-ijāzas, but rather very brief notes simply stating ‘ijāza for Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’, ‘he transmitted it to me/us (akhbaranī/akhbaranā)’ (we find that in al-Hawrānī’s Booklet, Plate I.8, in the note in the middle of the page) or ‘from the transmissions (min marwiyāt) of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’. It is the rare exception that such brief notes give any indication as to what the specific form of transmission actually was.⁶⁵ Again, his transmission diary gives some insight here and we learn, for instance, that he had an ijāza from scholars who had lived two generations before him because these scholars ‘gave an ijāza to my father and to whom is born to him’.⁶⁶

What is most peculiar are some notes that at first glance seem to be standard transmission notes in line with those thousands of notes from previous centuries. They start with one of the standard verbs (samiʿa or qaraʿa), name the teacher from whom the ijāza was received and run over several lines. Yet, they are radically different in that they typically do not contain the date of the reading and do not name any other participants. Rather, what we find instead in the place where ‘classical’ notes would carry names of other participants are detailed elaborations of the respective teacher’s lines of transmission – exactly the kind of material that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī had to fill in as the chain of transmission notes had been interrupted well before his teachers’ lifetimes.⁶⁷

Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī put considerable effort into fitting his ijāzas into the formal framework of post-canonical transmission notes that had ceased to exist. To this end he not only used what had become in Damascus by this point a largely archaic protocol, but he also had two further strategies to prominently inscribe himself into these manuscripts. Firstly, one occasionally gets the impression that he tries to bulldoze any possible doubts with as many notes as possible. For instance, in a standard post-canonical treatise of just ten folia, the Thulāthiyāt al-Bukhārī, he filled every possible blank space to put in a whopping twelve notes on him receiving the authority of transmission via different teachers.⁶⁸

Secondly, he put these transmission notes not at the end of the booklet, but rather right on the title page. When the protocol of transmission notes was alive and kicking, each new note was generally added at the end of the manuscript after the respective last note – very much as a graphic representation of the chain of transmission over the generations. On the title page we normally only find the very first transmission note in which the copyist or author of the book presents his authority of transmission to validate this copy. That Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī broke with this system is an expression of the fact that his notes were no longer really the same notes nor part of an uninterrupted chain of transmission. In consequence, he chose to prominently place them at the very beginning of the text. While he was pushing the manuscripts into a new life cycle, he thus employed his notes in a way that revived a distant post-canonical past, but also reworked its protocol.

This new stage in their life cycle as re-activated texts was very brief and Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī certainly did not expect that his way of dealing with the booklets would trigger a watershed in how Damascene scholars would use them in future. His project was rather one of monumentalisation and thus creating a lieu de memoire, but not one with a ‘revivalist’ bent. Indeed, apart from his second set of notes, where he reads the booklets to members of his household (and we will see that these readings were not aimed at a scholarly context, but that they were a ritualistic and devotional practice linked with the act of endowment), there is very little going on in terms of manuscript notes. Occasionally we find a note where Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī reads his works to scholars, such as a session in the year 905/1500 where we find him reading a work from his collection, the Thulāthiyāt musnad Aḥmad, to a large group of scholars.⁶⁹ The general picture, however, is that of an absence of manuscript notes documenting any reading outside his household. More importantly, we also see a near-complete absence of any transmission notes whatsoever between his lifetime and today.

As we have seen, not one member of his household took up a scholarly career and in the case of his concubines the point of the licence was probably not for them to embark on a scholarly career. Garrett Davidson has reminded us that an ijāza could have two very distinct purposes: to merely grant permission to transmit ḥadīth (ijāzat al-riwāya) and to grant qualified individuals the permission to actually teach them (ijāzat al-dirāya).⁷⁰ In the manuscript notes this difference is never stated and participants could attend a reading for either purpose. In the case of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s household notes it is very likely that the main aim was ‘only’ to grant permission to transmit ḥadīth, which is also evident from the attendance of his infant children.

However, there is one major exception to the short-lived nature of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s project and that is Ibn Ṭūlūn. We have already seen that he plays a unique role in carrying on his teacher’s oeuvre and his peculiar position is reflected in the manuscript notes. Ibn Ṭūlūn is the only ‘outsider’ who systematically participated in the reading sessions in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s home. He is also the only individual who takes on the role of reading a text, which was usually reserved for Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī himself.⁷¹ His presence in the intimate reading sessions shows that he was very much part of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī household and Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī consistently notes him down affectionately as ‘walad’, which is here best translated as ‘son’. In those cases where different copies of the same text were present in a reading session, the full manuscript note with all names was usually only entered into the copy used for the actual reading while an abridged version was entered in the other copy. These abridged versions are of particular interest to understand whom the writer considered worthy of mention. As might be expected, in these cases Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī copied over the names of his children and also that of Ibn Ṭūlūn.⁷²

At the beginning of this chapter we saw that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī had a key role in preserving what we see today in the National al-Asad Library in terms of Mamluk-period ḥadīth works. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was not only the last great scholar of post-canonical ḥadīth scholarship in the city, but also by collecting the booklets and endowing them he set up for this tradition a great monument that still stands today. Time has taken its toll, it is time-worn, parts have disappeared and the visitor has to search for it as it has been moved from its original site – as have so many other monuments – and reconfigured. Yet in large part, it is still there in Damascus and had it not been for Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī it is likely that most of these books would have been lost.

Rituals of a Book Endowment: Binge-reading and Dreams

The decisive act that renders Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s project meaningful was that he endowed his books in order to give them long-lasting protection from the vicissitudes of private ownership. This is documented in the catalogue that is at the heart of this book, which lists the books he endowed for his own benefit and subsequently that of his children. At this point we have first to turn to technical issues, as what this list actually is and when it was written is not that straightforward. The fihrist is undated and we thus have to turn to circumstantial evidence to date it. The fihrist includes virtually all the titles that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī mentioned in his auto-bibliographical Naming my Books list written in year 891/1486–7, but it also includes additional titles that are not in that list. The fihrist was therefore most likely written at some point after that year. On the other hand, we see that specific corpora written by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī are neither in the Naming my Books list nor the fihrist, so he must have written these books after he had finished the fihrist. For instance, we have already seen that most of his medical books are not mentioned in the fihrist and that these works were written after the year 901/1495–6. This narrows down the window for dating the fihrist to a period of some ten years between roughly 891/1486–7 and 901/1495–6.

Now, there is one date in the fihrīst – 896/1491 – which Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī records alongside his written narrative of his dream vision.⁷³ This date in itself is not terribly useful as the mise-en-page indicates that the narrative was added to the title page and this could have happened at any point after he completed the fihrīst. However, the following year emerges as very salient when looking at the actual manuscripts that are listed in the fihrīst. On these manuscripts we find one large corpus of dated notes for 897/1492, in which he recorded the reading of his books to his family. Out of the 291 dated reading sessions, 243 took place in that same year, that is 84 per cent. In that year Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī embarked on a binge-reading session of the books in his library. This is in itself quite peculiar, but it is even more striking that the participants at the reading sessions are almost exclusively from his household, more specifically his children and concubines. To take one example: on the 27th of the month Rabī‘ al-thānī of that year he read out two booklets comprising forty-four pages.⁷⁴ The next day he sat down with family members to read another three booklets with a total of sixty-six pages.⁷⁵ With this momentum behind him the following day he read another five booklets with a total of 122 pages.⁷⁶

His three sons ‘Abd al-Hādī, Ḥasan and ‘Abd Allāh are usually present, but the oldest, ‘Abd al-Hādī, must have been quite a disappointment to his father as he hardly ever attended a full reading session – and Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī does not fail to note this. His concubines Ghazāl, Jawhara, Ḥalwa and Bulbul are also usually there. His youngest son Aḥmad was born on the 28th Rabī‘ al-thānī and we see him joining the reading right away at the tender age of a few hours. We see members of the household coming into these sessions and leaving, which is not surprising as they must have been exhausting. Though

‘Abd al-Hādī was the undisputed master of missing parts of sessions, partial participation is quite common. We see for instance notes that state that ‘Abd Allāh heard ‘most of it’, Ḥasan ‘less than him’ and ‘Abd al-Hādī ‘less than him [Ḥasan]’.⁷⁷ Members of the household clearly struggled to keep up with Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s relentless rhythm.

These hundreds of notes give a very intimate impression of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī household with ever new combinations of its members and more distant relatives (including granddaughters and a grandson of his cousin) sitting down to take part in the reading sessions.⁷⁸ All these readings took place in his house (manzil) in The Upper Lot or his orchard. The birth of Aḥmad itself was celebrated at one such homely reading. The first reading note in which he is mentioned, a few hours after his birth, is a virtual birth certificate as we find his full name, Abū Nu‘aym ‘Imād al-Dīn Aḥmad (no one else’s full name is noted at these family sessions). In addition, we find not only Aḥmad’s mother, Bulbul, but also other concubines, Jawhara, Ghazāl and Ḥalwa, as well as female relatives who dropped in such as his daughter-in-law Fāṭima bt. ‘Umar.⁷⁹ Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī had also held reading sessions earlier that day while Bulbul was giving birth and we see that only his three sons participated in these sessions. It thus seems that the evening session with the infant Aḥmad, his mother and other women was in fact held to celebrate the new arrival.

Within this binge-reading, listening to a text once was not necessarily enough. In cases where the same text existed in two physical copies, both had to be read out.⁸⁰ Bulbul, the second Bulbul, was already one of the most dedicated participants, but sometimes she attended further readings of the same manuscript.⁸¹ These reading sessions were not just taxing for

Other examples of repeated readings include MS Damascus, National al-Asad Library 3797/13, fol. 152a (cf. no. 493k) where his sons ‘Abd al-Hādī and ‘Abd Allāh are noted down as having attended a previous reading (‘ghayr hādhibī al-marra’).

Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, but also for the other members of his household. That the infant Aḥmad fell asleep during these sessions is not too surprising.⁸² Yet the same happened to Ḥasan, who was some thirteen years old, at an evening reading and adults, such as Bulbul 1 or 2, were not always able to keep their eyes open.⁸³

Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was incredibly determined to get through his books in that year and even illness did not deter him. This is evident from a peculiar set of notes. All the hundreds of transmission notes for that year are written in his hand and it was clearly very important for him to pen them himself. We only find one exception to this, which happened some two weeks before the reading sessions at the end of the month Rabī‘ al-thānī that we just discussed. Here we have notes that start in a very unsteady hand and then his eldest son ‘Abd al-Hādī takes over. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī signs these notes, but he clearly has problems holding the pen as we see unusual blotches of ink and smudged words (see Plate I.9). In the overall corpus of Damascene manuscript notes, a change of hand within a single note is very rare and the only explanation here is that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was too weak to hold the pen and had to hand it over. Yet, he clearly did not consider himself too weak to read these books aloud.

Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī bade farewell to his books in a highly ritualised way; the year 897/1492 was clearly a special year in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī household and it was a special year for his books. The long days and nights of reading in The Upper Lot on Mount Qāsyūn were closely tied to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s monumentalisation project. This binge-reading marked a decisive moment in the life cycle of his books and in his own life. It was the point when he virtually stopped engaging with the field of ḥadīth and moved on to new scholarly pastures, especially medicine. He once again brought them to scholarly life by reading them out and by recording these readings with manuscript notes using the post-canonical protocol. The notes reflect an incredibly dense reading activity over the course of a year in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī household and it must be underlined that the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī manuscript corpus identified for the present book encompasses only half of the manuscripts that had once been in his house. Thus, we only get a partial glimpse into what was going in that year as many notes are not available.

Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī not only accompanied his endowment with these highly ritualised reading sessions that he registered on the individual books, but he also took care to frame the fihrist itself in a very peculiar way. He wrote the fihrist most likely shortly after he endowed the books in his house and at any rate long before they went into the ‘Umariya Library. On the ‘title page’ of the fihrist we find an element that has not been picked up in previous scholarship, namely the narrative of his dream vision (ru’ya) in the year 896/1491. This dream is not just a brief note – it clearly dominates the entire page (see Plate II.1). In this dream (see full text in Chapter 5, pp. 198–9), Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī conveyed three points that are of relevance for understanding the importance he ascribed to his endowment. Firstly, he appears as rightly guided and is the only one to turn away from an imām who is negligent in leading the prayer. While the other participants in the dream did not see, or did not react to, the imām’s deficiency, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī does not compromise and embarks on the lonely journey of the righteous. This arduous journey, secondly, leads him to the door of Paradise after he is repeatedly called upon to make choices as to which is the right path or door. Finally, he almost came to the end of his life as he was tempted to enter Paradise, but withstood and woke up. This image of the righteous scholar, destined for Paradise and withstanding temptation, was meant to serve as the gateway into the splendid collection of books that was to follow on the subsequent pages once the reader had turned the page. Predictably, the script and mise-en-page of the dream narrative looks unspectacular and the reader has to turn the page by ninety degrees three times to follow it. Page design was not Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s strength and this is not negligence, but simply the way he operated. The title page is not a page with scribbles in ‘shoddy’ script; it has a crucial function to guide the beholder into what was to follow. Together with the ritualistic binge-reading of his works, it is a clear indicator of the importance Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī ascribed to his endowment.

The book collection monument that went into the ‘Umariya accompanied by its catalogue was part of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s much wider strategy to write himself and his community into history. In particular, he made sure that his own role in preserving this legacy of Ḥanbali-Ṣālihiyan ḥadīth scholarship would not be forgotten. To this end he authored numerous bibliographical lists and works. Apart from the fibrist, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī authored at least one other list of the books he owned, the safīna-shaped Titles of the Books Owned by Me that we have seen above.⁸⁴ In addition to book-ownership lists, he authored auto-bibliographies of his oeuvre such as Naming my Books also seen above.⁸⁵ He did not stop there, but also wrote at least two further auto-bibliographies, Names of my Books (Asmā’ kutubī) and Naming my Compilations (Tasmiyat muṣannafātī).⁸⁶ Finally, he also compiled bibliographies of ‘important’ works, that were for him mostly Ḥanbali works, such as The Dictionary of Books (Mu‘jam al-kutub) in three volumes and Evoking Eternity Regarding the Compilations of the Ḥanbalis (al-Dhikr al-sarmad fī muṣannafāt aṣḥāb Aḥmad) – aptly entitled against the background of his monumentalisation project. To further commemorate this strain of scholarship, he put an emphasis on collecting author-specific bibliographies, such as two works on the oeuvre of his ancestor Muḥammad b. Aḥmad Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī (d. 744/1343), the Names of the Books of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī (Asmā’ kutub Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī) and Naming the Compilations of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī (Tasmiyat muṣannafāt Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī).⁸⁷

Endowing Books in Theory and Practice

We thus know that the fibrist was in all probability written in the year 897/1492 in the framework of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s monumentalisation project and this is also the key to understanding what this text is. It is evidently not a legal document, as there are hardly any legal formulas, there is no attestation by a judge, there are no witness signatures and there is no date.⁸⁸

Most likely, there was a legal document accompanying it, but this has not come down to us. Nor is the fihrist a practical catalogue destined to help the users of a library navigate the books. As we will see in Chapter 5, there is no thematic organisation and there is also no interest in classifying the books by other criteria, such as authors or even size. The fihrist is rather a literary text that was meant to accompany the actual material objects, the manuscripts that went into the monumentalisation project. This catalogue did indeed go with the books it mentions into the ‘Umarīya Madrasa from where it was taken to the new Public Library in 1878.⁸⁹

While the fihrist itself is not a legal document, it was clearly written in a legal context: the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī list documents the books that he ‘endowed for himself, subsequently for his children, subsequently for their children, subsequently for his offspring and descendants and subsequently for whoever benefits from them from among the Ḥanbalis’.⁹⁰ This is thus a family endowment with the standard non-family charitable beneficiary (here the Ḥanbali community) named in the event that his family line came to an end. Endowing goods that yield income (lands, shops, houses and so on) has a self-evident purpose as the proceeds could be used to sustain a charitable activity. Endowing books, by contrast, has only an immaterial significance, as little material benefit is derived from reading them.⁹¹ The principal aim of endowing books was really to ensure that a collection would not be dispersed after the endower’s death, but survive as a single collection. In many ways it would be more helpful to think about such book endowments as ‘donations’ of goods with the provision that they were not to re-enter market circulation.

In the case of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī this ‘endowment’ furthermore took the legal form of a family endowment, a waqf ahli. This was the most common form used to endow books for which the endower retained sole personal benefit during his lifetime, to be succeeded by his heirs, and only ultimately made available for charitable purposes. In the first instance, endowing your books for your own benefit does not make a major difference. Legally you were no longer the owner, only the administrator. Yet as these books stayed in your house there was not too much difference between before and after endowment. In the case of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s book endowment we regretably have no documentary evidence on the exact provisions, nor do we have a single endowment note by him on his hundreds of books. The one note that explicitly refers to an endowment by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, ‘waqf Yūsuf Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’, was probably not written by him and there is no indication as to when it was written.⁹²

In fact, we do not have a single manuscript with a note stating that any of his books were endowed to the ‘Umarīya Madrasa. However, this is not too surprising as endowment notes on manuscripts were not a standard feature of Syrian documentary practices well into the Ottoman period. In the age of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī and in the previous centuries, there was clearly no requirement or expectation to systematically record where a manuscript was endowed and, in most cases, that it was endowed at all. In the case of the Ashrafiya endowment from the thirteenth century we do not have a single manuscript bearing such a note.⁹³ The main exception to this void of endowment notes in medieval Damascus, and we will return to this later, are endowments into the Ḍiyā’iya Madrasa/Dār al-Ḥadīth, which Youssef Eche used in his study of medieval libraries.⁹⁴

Many of the manuscripts from the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī corpus do carry a simple note with the word ‘‘Umarīya’ and modern cataloguers have repeatedly mistaken this as an endowment note.⁹⁵ However, these notes are only in those manuscripts that were transferred in 1878 from the ‘Umarīya Madrasa to the new Public Library. We do not find them on those manuscripts from the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī corpus that had previously left the endowment and that are today in libraries around the world.⁹⁶ When the manuscripts were transferred in 1878 the word ‘‘Umarīya’ was thus written on the manuscripts as a provenance note, not as an endowment note. As the script of the handwritten catalogue produced after the transfer is strikingly similar to these provenance notes, they were most likely written by the same librarian when he was sorting the books as they arrived in the new library.⁹⁷ In other words, there is hardly any evidence that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī ever intended to place his books into the ‘Umarīya Madrasa.

We do at least know from the above-mentioned catalogue of the new Public Library, the Sublime Register, that the vast majority of his books did indeed go into the ‘Umarīya Madrasa. Admittedly, a nineteenth-century catalogue is not the most elegant source to write late Mamluk history. Yet, in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s case we see that the narrative sources unanimously assume that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī endowed his books into this madrasa. Most importantly, his closest student and ‘Umarīya librarian Ibn Ṭūlūn states that he was an avid collector of books and ‘endowed them all to the ‘Umarīya Madrasa’.⁹⁸ Elsewhere he again lists Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī as a matter of course among those whose books are in the library.⁹⁹ When exactly the books were moved from Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s private home into the madrasa is unclear, but it did not necessarily require another legal act and probably happened after his death. Whether this move entailed a change in the status of the endowment is also not clear, but it was not uncommon for family endowments, waqf ahli, to change into charitable endowments.¹⁰⁰ We have a broadly comparable case of a book endowment that was first placed in the private home of the endower and then moved into a madrasa. This is an endowment note of ‘Alī al-Ḥiṣnī (d. 688/1289) that spelled out the endowment of his books. When he constituted them as a charitable endowment ‘for all Muslims’, he appointed himself as the endowment’s administrator (nāzir) and stipulated that these books were to be moved to the Ḍiyā’īya Madrasa/Dār al-Ḥadīth after his death.¹⁰¹

Once Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s books had gone into the library of the madrasa they did not lose their status as an independent and cohesive collection. Books that were endowed into an existing library were generally not merged with the existing stock, but kept physically apart – at least initially. In consequence, larger libraries such as that in the ‘Umarīya Madrasa were made up of numerous legally and physically independent book collections. When Ibn Ṭūlūn describes this library, for instance, he speaks of distinct khazā’ in (literally book cases, but here rather ‘collections’) and each of these collections, such as that of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, is identified by its endower’s name. For the case of the Ḍiyā’īya, we once again have evidence in the form of endowment notes on manuscripts that corroborate that practice. When one of the Maqdisīs, Bahā’ al-Dīn ‘Abd al-Raḥmān (d. 624/1227), endowed his books into this library in the mid-twelfth century, his endowment notes state that this is an ‘endowment located in the Ḍiyā’īya on Mount Qāsyūn in the collection/book case (khizāna) of al-Bahā’’.¹⁰² Similarly, we find in endowment notes a reference to a separate khizāna for the books of ‘Abd al-Ghanī al-Maqdisī (d. 600/1203) and another endower stipulates that this book has to go into an existing khizāna, that of ‘Umar b. Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥājib (d. 630/1233).¹⁰³ The legal separation between the individual endowments was enhanced by the fact that each collection had – at least in theory – its own administrator.¹⁰⁴ However, such distinct status was certainly susceptible to fading away over time and when the Damascene endowment libraries were dissolved in 1878 there is no indication that the librarians in the new library considered such distinctions to be of relevance (if they still existed).

The broad story of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī endowment now seems clear in terms of when the books were endowed, around the year 897/1492, in terms of where they were placed, first at home and subsequently in the ‘Umarīya Madrasa, and in terms of the legal framework, first as a family endowment and subsequently as a charitable one. However, there are two elements that render this clean narrative more complicated. The first element is more of a footnote and does not need to detain us too long. We know that numerous books that were in the possession of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī and that are not mentioned in the fihrist also went into the ‘Umarīya Madrasa and thus in all likelihood also became part of the very same endowment. These are typically works that were written after the year 897/1492¹⁰⁵ and/or works in the field of medicine.¹⁰⁶ However, as the present book is not a study in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādīology, but a study of the social and cultural significance of his fihrist, this has no major bearing on the discussion.

However, it is crucial to underline the second element as it draws attention to the fact that even a microhistory such as the present study of one single catalogue has to brush over the many individual stories that the manuscripts tell us. In numerous cases the notes on Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s books indicate a trajectory that is far more complicated than books in private possession going into an endowment and thus being withdrawn from market circulation. A good example of this is entry number 34 in the fihrist, the legal compendium Book of Clarification (Kitāb al-Wādīh) by the Ḥanbali scholar Ibn ‘Aqīl (d. 513/1119). We see from the notes that the book was once owned by one of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s teachers, Abū Bakr Ibn Qundus (d. 861/1457), whose son sold it to al-Qāḍī ‘Alā’ al-Dīn (d. 885/1480), another of his teachers. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī most likely bought this book from the estate of ‘Alā’ al-Dīn and then lists it in his fihrist as part of his endowment.

So far so good, but after the endowment this book returns to the private ownership of a student of his, Aḥmad b. Yaḥyā b. ‘Aṭwa al-Najdī (d. 948/1541).¹⁰⁷ We do not know how Aḥmad al-Najdī got hold of the book, but we then see that he (re)endows the book into – the ‘Umarīya

Madrassa. He thus brings the book back to where he thought it belonged, but interestingly he did so by constituting it as his own endowment.¹⁰⁸ This is not an isolated case and al-Najdī's numerous endowment notes make it clear that he did not go for the other option: reconstituting these books as part of Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's endowment. However, if we look at the distribution of Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī manuscripts in libraries around the world today, it is evident that these manuscripts were in practice returned to the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī corpus. Virtually all of the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī-cum-Aḥmad al-Najdī manuscripts that were in the fihrist are listed in the catalogue of the 1878 dissolution with a 'Umarīya provenance and are until today in Damascus.

We have some cases where the rather opaque story of Aḥmad al-Najdī appropriating an endowed book for private ownership and then re-endowing it becomes clearer. We repeatedly see that Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's sons sold off his books, for instance when his son 'Alī sells a book listed in the fihrist to Aḥmad al-Najdī.¹⁰⁹ It seems that at least some of the endowed books were sold when Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's estate was settled, as is evident from another purchase note by Aḥmad al-Najdī.¹¹⁰ Apart from Aḥmad al-Najdī we see that Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's closest student Ibn Ṭūlūn bought several of the endowed books, again to re-endow them into the 'Umarīya Madrasa. Ibn Ṭūlūn bought these books for the most part from the eldest heir, 'Abd al-Hādī.¹¹¹ Yet, we also see other sons selling books from the endowment, such as Ḥasan who sold one of his father's autographs some forty years after his death.¹¹²

These sales by his sons show us first and foremost that Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī had the right inclination when he endowed his books to preserve the integrity of his collection. His heirs had seemingly limited interest in preserving the immaterial value of their father's collection and/or urgently needed cash. Secondly, it shows us once again that theory and practice does also not always overlap in the case of book endowments and we will return to that later on. Thirdly we see, by contrast, that his students did have a strong interest in preserving the collection and they made sure that his books went where Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī had intended them to be, the ‘Umarīya Madrasa. What is more, they must have returned numerous of them to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s sub-collection within the ‘Umarīya Madrasa, as many of the books they returned remained part of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī corpus until 1878. The difference between how sons and students viewed this collection is even better illustrated by the trajectory of another legal compendium in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s endowment list, the Book of Introduction (Kitāb al-Tambīd) by Maḥfūz al-Kalwādhānī (d. 510/1116). From Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s endowment it went into the hands of a book trader by the name of Sayf al-Dīn al-Kutubī. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s son ‘Alī, in turn, bought it from this book trader. Yet, rather than doing what his father would have probably loved him to do, bring it back to the madrasa, he sold it on to Aḥmad al-Najdī and it was only thanks to this Aḥmad that the book was re-endowed into the ‘Umarīya Madrasa.¹¹³ Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s students not only re-endowed his books, but we observe also that they looked after them in material terms. There are several cases where Ibn Ṭūlūn or al-Najdī rebound items that had been separate books in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s fihrist.¹¹⁴

The legal trajectory of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s books was thus much more complicated than a mere switch from private ownership to endowed status at one specific point. The previous examples have shown how easily endowed books return to market circulation and how easily these books could then return to endowed status. However, we have indications that things had already been complicated prior to the endowment year of 897/1492. For instance, we have Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s note in which he mentions the transfer of his properties to his sons in the year 884/1479 and here he gives his books (kutubī) to his eldest son ‘Abd al-Hādī.¹¹⁵ It is very likely that the books Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī mentioned here (and he clearly implies that they were all his books) were the foundation stock of those that he endowed some thirteen years later. Yet for this endowment to take place, the books must have been returned to his ownership in the meantime, even though we have no documentary trace of how or when this happened. Thus, a healthy proportion of the books that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī endowed had a trajectory with numerous distinct legal statuses, such as: private ownership by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī; private ownership by his son ‘Abd al-Hādī; again private ownership by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī; endowment by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī; private ownership by one of his sons (for instance, again ‘Abd al-Hādī); private ownership by buyer of book (such as Ibn Ṭūlūn); and endowment in ‘Umariya Madrasa. We will see in the following chapter that the trajectory of these books, if we move beyond this very narrow bracket of some forty years, entails many more movements back and forth between private ownership and endowment. The monumentalisation project of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī is but one moment in these books’ life cycles and, as is so often the case, such endowment projects sound straightforward on paper, but are decisively messier on the ground.

It is important to underline that the endowment of a book was in theory for eternity, but that their actual trajectories – as those of other endowed properties – were obviously quite varied. We do not know the legal context of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s sons selling his endowed books and it might have been perfectly legal, for instance by using the mechanism of istibdāl or ‘exchange’, by which endowed property could be extracted from the endowment. However, it is evident that individuals were often not too worried to explicate the legality of what they were doing when it came to endowed books. For instance, some 150 years after Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī had endowed his dictionary of toponyms, a certain Ibrāhīm b. Sulaymān al-Ḥanafī had no qualms about proudly declaring that he had become the owner of this book (ṣāra fī nawbat) in the year 1078/1667.¹¹⁶ Again, this could have been a perfectly legal purchase, but the fact that no attempt is made to show the legality of these purchases (if they existed) indicates that this was seemingly not a burning topic. We will see in the following chapter that hundreds of the books that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī himself owned and subsequently endowed had previously been endowed in other Damascene institutions. Overall, the continuous movement of books between different legal statuses emphatically supports Astrid Meier's suggestion that the study of endowment should move away from normative-centred approaches to those that centre on practices of endowing that show considerable degrees of adaptivity and flexibility.¹¹⁷ Rather than focusing on deviation from norms and framing this as illegal appropriation of trusted property,¹¹⁸ the case of Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's books show that actors in late Mamluk and early Ottoman Damascus were comfortable with previously endowed objects repeatedly going back into private ownership – whether they were buyers or sellers of these items.

Placing the Monument

Having looked at the thematic profile of the fihrist, its ritualistic framing and its legal implications, this chapter now turns to the spatial setting of Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's monument of books. At the end of the fifteenth century, Damascus, like Alexandria and Aleppo, was still one of the main cities within the Mamluk realms after Cairo. It had certainly lost the position it held between the twelfth and late thirteenth century as the main scholarly centre in the Levant. During that period, the 'Syrian Century', the city and its scholars had played a pivotal role in the development of various fields of knowledge. The regionalised political structure of the Levant at this point had meant that the individual Ayyubid courts were competing with one another to attract artists and scholars. Within this colourful political landscape, Damascus had gained a rare degree of political importance that it was able to translate into a towering scholarly position.

The most striking expression of this development for our purposes was the extraordinarily vivid world of post-canonical ḥadīth scholarship. As said before, we know little of the development of this scholarship in terms of regional distribution and variation. For instance, it seems that with Damascus' subsequent gradual integration into the new Mamluk Empire from the second half of the thirteenth century onwards, the city lost out not only in political importance, as the scholarly world also became increasingly focused on Cairo, which emerged as a new centre for the field of ḥadīth scholarship. Yet how this played out on the ground in Cairo, what changes in textual formats and manuscript culture that brought about and who the main players were is not known to date. With regard to Damascus, it is my impression – and we need more studies to move beyond impressions – that not only did post-canonical ḥadīth scholarship enjoy a golden age in the city between the twelfth and fourteenth centuries, but also that Damascus was during this period the most important place anywhere in the Middle East for this line of scholarship by far; it was the undisputed centre. This impression is corroborated by the flourishing of specialised institutions for the transmission of ḥadīth, Dār al-Ḥadīths, in Damascus during this period while we only find one such institution in Cairo.¹¹⁹ As post-canonical ḥadīth scholarship was so closely tied to Ḥanbalism, the rise of Damascus in this field was certainly also linked to the overall shift of the centre of gravity of Ḥanbalism from the eastern Muslim world, especially Baghdad, to Damascus in the course of the twelfth century.¹²⁰

From the Damascene manuscripts it is evident that many of them had a previous life cycle in the Eastern Islamic world and subsequently gravitated towards Damascus. For instance, a booklet of nine folia with the title Fawā'id Abī Bakr b. Salmān carries two transmission notes that were written in Baghdad in the year 564/1169, but some twenty years later, in the year 593/1197, it was read out in Damascus to 'Abd al-Ghanī al-Maqdisī and this 'Abd al-Ghanī then endowed it into the Ḍiyā'īya from where it found its way into the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī collection.¹²¹ Even if the actual object, the manuscript, from the east was not preserved, Damascene copyists repeatedly inscribed the memory of its previous eastern life cycle into the Damascene manuscripts copied from it. For instance, entry number 549e (today National al-Asad Library MS 1088/4) was copied in Damascus in the late thirteenth century. The copyist of this ḥadīth collection of eleven folia put after the main text an appendix with five copied samā'-notes that he copied from the original manuscript. Here, he made sure to mention Isfahan as the city where one of these readings took place.¹²²

This ‘gravitation’ of the booklets to Damascus was the outcome of wide-ranging scholarly voyages of members of the Maqdisī family who, in contrast to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, do indeed fit the cliché of the scholar on the move. ‘Abd al-Ghanī, for instance, had travelled to the east (Baghdad, Isfahan, Mosul) and the west (Egypt) to secure rights of transmission and, according to his biographers, to purchase books.¹²³ The founder of the Ḍiyā’īya himself, Ḍiyā’ al-Dīn al-Maqdisī, had travelled even farther to the east so that he not only covered Baghdad, Mosul and Isfahan, but also Hamadhan in Iran, Herat in Afghanistan and Marw in Khurasan. Again, according to his biographies he not only acquired rights of transmission, but also bought the actual physical books in large numbers.¹²⁴ That Maqdisīs set out to seek knowledge and used these voyages as veritable shopping sprees is one piece in the puzzle to explain the extraordinary richness of the post-canonical ḥadīth manuscript culture that we find in Damascus. In fact, as Hassan Ansari has highlighted, these shopping sprees had the unintended result that the vast majority of manuscripts from the former Ḥanbalī centres of the east that are extant today have survived in Damascus. The vast majority of those manuscripts that stayed in these cities, in contrast, perished in the upheaval caused by inter-madhab conflicts and the Mongol invasions.¹²⁵ More importantly for our purposes here, this transfer of physical copies shows to what extent Damascus with its Maqdisī agents had at this point acquired an outstanding position in the transregional landscape of post-canonical ḥadīth transmission.

In the Damascene scholarly topography, the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter was at the epicentre of this line of scholarship and within the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter, scholars active in this field gravitated around three sites in particular, the Muzaffarī Mosque, the Ḍiyā’īya Madrasa/Dār al-Ḥadīth and the ‘Umarīya Madrasa. The Muzaffarī Mosque (see Map 1.2, number 36) was probably the first ‘public’ building in the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter and was founded by none other than Abū ‘Umar himself. It was the first Friday Mosque (jāmi‘) outside the city walls of Damascus and was so central to the identity of the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter that it was also called Jāmi‘ al-Jabal (The Mosque of the Mount, that is Mount Qāsyūn) and Jāmi‘ al-Şālihīn (The Mosque of the Inhabitants of Şālihīya). It was not only important for the quarter, but also for the entire Damascene Ḥanbali community, as another of its epithets was Jāmi‘ al-Ḥanābila (The Mosque of the Ḥanbalis). In his seminal study on this mosque, Muḥammad Muṭī‘ al-Ḥāfīz has shown its important role in the transmission of ḥadīth on the basis of manuscript notes, calling it the ‘Maqdisīs’ beacon of the scholarly awakening in Damascus’ – ‘scholarly awakening’ here basically meaning the study of ḥadīth.¹²⁶ Similarly, Nagihan Emiroğlu has underlined the importance of the Muẓaffarī Mosque, especially for sessions with female members of the Maqdisīs.¹²⁷ However, while this mosque’s role in the scholarly topography of Şālihīya was paramount, it seemingly never housed a major book collection. This would be in line with the overall impression that we currently have of the library landscape of medieval Damascus, where mosques, except for the Umayyad Mosque, do not seem to have held major book collections.

The case is very different for the Ḍiyā’īya Dār al-Ḥadīth (often also called madrasa) directly to the east of the Muẓaffarī Mosque. The Ḍiyā’īya (see Map 1.2, number 24) housed one of the major libraries, at least of post-canonical ḥadīth works, in Şālihīya and arguably in all of Damascus. This institution was founded in the thirteenth century by Ḍiyā’ al-Dīn al-Maqdisī, who endowed in it his book collection, a substantial part of which he had acquired on his voyages to the east. The Ḍiyā’īya is an integral part of the story of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s collection, as so many of its books subsequently moved into his collection, and we will return to it in more detail in the next chapter. It suffices here to refer to another study by Muḥammad Muṭī‘ al-Ḥāfīz, again based on manuscript notes, where he shows the central role of the Ḍiyā’īya for post-canonical ḥadīth transmission in Damascus, especially in the thirteenth century.¹²⁸ From the fourteenth century its library holdings were dispersed, even though it continued to exist as a teaching institution. The scholar Ibn Ḥajar, for instance, took off to Cairo with ‘several loads’ of endowed books from the Ḍiyā’īya – yet another sign of the increasing importance of Cairo.¹²⁹ In consequence, the Ḍiyā'īya had lost its pivotal role in the scholarly topography of Ṣāliḥīya and Damascus during Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's lifetime.

With the relative demise of the Ḍiyā'īya, it was the 'Umarīya Madrasa that became the undisputed teaching institution in Ṣāliḥīya and the symbol of the quarter's Ḥanbali and specifically Maqdisī identity (see Map 1.2, number 38 and Map 2.2).¹³⁰ Located just 100 metres to the south of the Muẓaffarī Mosque and also founded by Abū 'Umar shortly after the Muẓaffarī Mosque, it was the oldest teaching institution in the quarter. Its massive endowments meant that extensive charitable activities (such as distributing food to the needy) were centred around it. More to the point for our purposes, these endowments also supported a staggering number of resident and non-resident scholars. The figure of 360 lodging rooms for scholars reported for the fifteenth century should probably not be taken at face value,¹³¹ but it is evident that this madrasa had a pivotal role in scholarship – especially of the Maqdisī and Ḥanbali vein. This position is confirmed by the fact that al-Qalqashandī cites the appointment decree for this madrasa's administrator as an exemplar for such documents in his Egyptian chancery manual.¹³² This role was also expressed in the continuing influx of supplementary endowments into its library by scholars who (posthumously) placed their private book collections in this institution. Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's book collection was intrinsically linked with this madrasa as many of its books had been written there and/or transmitted in it.¹³³

However, this madrasa was also affected by the transformations of late Mamluk society in Damascus, especially the privatisation of endowment properties. For the 'Umarīya Madrasa quite recent changes might have been particularly worrisome for the Ḥanbali community of Ṣāliḥīya. The flagship of Ḥanbalism on Mount Qāsyūn had started to open up to the other law schools from the mid-fifteenth century thereby losing its exclusive Ḥanbali identity. These changes were not necessarily for the worse, as the ‘Umarīya had fallen into financial problems and new posts with new endowments were not unwelcome. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī himself expressed his approval of this opening.¹³⁴ Much more worrying was that this opening did not spell the end of the ‘Umarīya’s troubles as Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī had hoped. Rather, the madrasa soon entered a period of severe disintegration and its administrators were accused of, and probably guilty of, selling off endowment properties and misappropriating revenues.

There is some hyperbole involved when chroniclers wrote about the madrasas in Šāliḥīya during this period, for example the claim that the administrators ‘demolished the walls and sold the gates until it came to be a mere kennel for dogs’.¹³⁵ Similarly, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s sweeping assessment that Nāṣir al-Dīn Ibn Zurayq (d. 900/1495), the ‘Umarīya Madrasa’s administrator in his lifetime, ‘sold many of its endowment properties’ must be seen in the light of the low esteem in which he held ‘this half-wit whose mind and body were corrupted because he ate balādhur nut [a performance-enhancing drug with some negative side-effects]’.¹³⁶ However, the fact that similar descriptions of how the state of affairs had gone awry are also found in other contemporary texts show that the ‘Umarīya Madrasa and other madrasas went through a difficult period indeed. In the case of the ‘Umarīya, Toru Miura has suggested that this development must be seen in the context of attempts by Ibn Zurayq to use the funds to build up a socio-political ‘faction’ (or rather household) to gain influence.¹³⁷ In the early Ottoman period, the foundation of sultanic endowments nearby arguably had a detrimental effect on the madrasa’s functioning and its central role in the quarter was further diminished.¹³⁸

That the ‘Umarīya Madrasa went through a crisis that might have called into question its very survival shows that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s book endowment was not just an endowment destined for a pivotal madrasa, but also that it came at a very specific point in history. This crisis must have been all the more worrying for him as he was so closely attached to both the quarter and the ‘Umarīya. Not only had Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī spent all his life in the quarter, but also his family members were buried in its public cemetery, which had been endowed by their ancestor Muwaffaq al-Dīn Ibn Qudāma al-Maqdisī in the thirteenth century.¹³⁹ In his writings, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī took pains to describe how close his relatives were buried to the grand ancestors, for example pointing out exactly where his father was buried (right next to the grave of Muwaffaq al-Dīn on its northern side).¹⁴⁰

He also made sure that his own remembrance was linked with this quarter: when he endowed his properties in the year 885/1480–1 he constituted it in the first place as a family endowment but also put in the required charitable cause in case his family line came to an end. The Ottoman registers show that other late Mamluk endowments of the Maqdisī kinship group were destined for the holy sites in the Hejaz or for ‘the needy’ in general. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī also put ‘the needy’ as the ultimate beneficiaries, but specified that these were to be the needy ‘in the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter’.¹⁴¹ He furthermore made sure that this money was to be spent in a highly visible way, as the money was to be used to feed them at a great feast (simāt), probably in the ‘Umarīya Madrasa. In the same vein, the ultimate beneficiary of his book endowment itself were the ‘Ḥanbalis’ and, as we have seen, this community was very much identified with the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter. In this case, the ultimate beneficiary soon became the actual beneficiary, as his family probably drew little benefit from his books after they had gone into the ‘Umarīya Madrasa.

However, the crucial indicator for how central the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter was to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī is that he was the first to author a (lost) chronicle and topography dedicated to it. As we have seen this History of Ṣāliḥīya proved to be paradigmatic: the history of the quarter by his student Ibn Ṭūlūn was deeply steeped in it and Ibn Kannān, the subsequent author of a Ṣāliḥīya chronicle, abridged it some 200 years later.¹⁴² While Damascus had had its fair share of chronicles and topographies,¹⁴³ nobody had ever come up with a work dedicated to this quarter. The fact that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī sat down to compose such a work has to be seen within the same context as his monumentalisation project, that is to set a textual and material monument to the great past of his scholarly forefathers and foremothers as well as that of his ancestors. As we have seen, the topic of ḥadīth transmission and topography was closely aligned in the buldānīyāt genre. As such it is not too surprising that he composed works such as Forty ḥadīths Transmitted in Ṣāliḥīya and The Women of Mount Qāsyūn (referring to the female ḥadīth transmitters of the quarter) as well as two (lost) works on the merits (faḍā’il) of the quarter.¹⁴⁴ He even drilled deeper and authored Ten ḥadīths of al-Sahm, referring to his sub-quarter of The Upper Lot (al-Sahm al-‘lā).¹⁴⁵

Within the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter, the ‘Umarīya Madrasa was a highly symbolic and meaningful location for the endowment, not just because it was the main hub for scholars in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s lifetime and because his ancestors had founded it. He himself was intimately linked with it, especially via the production and transmission of the books he owned. In the colophons of his autographs we repeatedly find that he explicitly highlights that these works were written in the ‘Umarīya.¹⁴⁶ Similarly, books that were written by his close colleagues and that he acquired for his collection had also been routinely copied in this madrasa.¹⁴⁷ The ‘Umarīya appears also to be the main location where he participated in reading sessions when they did not take place in the homes of his teachers.¹⁴⁸ Moreover, we see that once he himself started to teach he preferred this madrasa for reading sessions on those occasions when he actually left his house.¹⁴⁹ As a consequence of his close link with this madrasa, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī intervened when he believed others contravened its endowment stipulations. For instance, he reports with some pride that he forced its administrator to retract a fatwā that tried to replace the distribution of meat on the feast with cash payments.¹⁵⁰ In brief, the ‘Umarīya was the institution to which he had the closest affiliation and the combination of its meaningful past and current troubles made it the ideal place to erect a monument to commemorate this past and revive a madrasa in decline.

Conclusion

Having seen in Chapter 1 Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s position as a man of considerable means, but a rather middling scholar, both in terms of social standing and scholarly prestige, this chapter has addressed the question of what the actual purpose was of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s endowment project. I have repeatedly called this a monumentalisation project and we have seen so far five elements that validate this term. (1) The book collection has a highly curated profile and Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī very carefully built it up to reflect the Ḥanbali-Ṣāliḥiyan tradition in the field of post-canonical ḥadīth transmission. He not only spent much time bringing together these booklets, but he must have also invested quite heavily in monetary terms to build up this collection. (2) He made extraordinary efforts to revive these dormant texts by connecting himself to chains of transmission that had been broken a century earlier. (3) By writing the fihrist, he made sure that this collection was accompanied by a ‘visitors’ guide’. This is neither a legal document nor a practical tool, but a literary text that he composed and adorned with his dream vision to guide the reader as to how to approach it. (4) He conducted a crucial transitory ritual, the binge-reading sessions, to mark the point when these books entered their new life cycle as a monument. (5) Finally, he placed this collection in a space that was highly significant for the very community that he wanted to commemorate: the ‘Umarīya Madrasa. This was the main institution linked with post-canonical ḥadīth transmission that had a major library (unlike the Muẓaffarī Mosque) and that was, despite its troubles, still fully functioning (unlike the Ḍiyā’īya).

Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī thus created his monument, or ‘museum of texts’,¹⁵¹ in a highly meaningful place in which he himself was prominently inscribed. In order to commemorate oneself and a specific social and scholarly past via a book collection, the more obvious choice would have been to construct a purpose-built library. However, such purpose-designed libraries were not known in his lifetime and they only start to appear in the Middle East from the beginning of the eighteenth century onwards in Istanbul. Despite the evident temporal gap, these buildings are of interest for our purposes: they were, as Yavuz Sezer has shown, very much aimed at the memorialisation of their founders in the urban topography to monumentalise their claims to learning.¹⁵² In this sense, we can also tie in the line of argument proposed by Willem Flinterman on endowment buildings in the Mamluk period: the multiple endowments by the Mamluk political elite did not only serve fiscal and propagandistic purposes, but they also enabled a commemorative cult. The endowment by al-Nāṣir Muḥammad Qalāwūn (r. 1293–4, 1299–1309, 1310–41) thus kept him socially alive because the beneficiaries of the subsequent decades formed a Qalāwūnid commemorative community – a community that was defined by its engagement in commemorative practices.¹⁵³ Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī did not build a bricks and mortar monument in Ṣāliḥīya, but he built one of paper and leather. In part he built a monument to his own learning, but much more so to a vanishing line of scholarship that had been central for his scholarly predecessors and his ancestors. There were no material benefits to be distributed from the endowment, so he could not aspire to it supporting a ‘commemorative community’. Nor did he aspire to constructing a striking building in the urban topography of Ṣāliḥīya symbolising what he wanted to be remembered.

¹⁵¹ Adopting the term from Bora, Historian’s Holograph who used it for text reuse in a chronicle.

¹⁵² Sezer, Architecture of Bibliophilia.

¹⁵³ Flinterman, Cult of Qalāwūn.

Yet, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī could aspire to his monument remaining meaningful at least to those who frequented the ‘Umarīya Madrasa. He described this space somewhat hyperbolically as a madrasa that is ‘enormous; in the entire Islamic world there is none that is larger.’¹⁵⁴ What this statement shows is that for the community that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī wanted to remember and to be remembered in future, this space was indeed of outstanding importance. And book corpora in libraries were crucial for building up communal identities. Christopher Bahl has shown, for instance, how Arabic text circulation connected communities across the western Indian Ocean with several libraries in South Asia functioning as key hubs.¹⁵⁵ The geographical horizons of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī were decisively more modest, yet he created a monument that was not just a passive repository, but one that would hark back to what he saw as the glorious past. That his students bought those books that had returned to the market and brought them back to the ‘Umarīya Madrasa clearly shows that at least the following generation could relate to this project.

The primary methodological implication of reading this book endowment as a monument brings us back to the present: it reminds us that a very large part of the Mamluk-period manuscripts in the current National al-Asad Library, and the vast majority of ḥadīth manuscripts from that period, came together as a carefully curated corpus in the late fifteenth century. As such they are not a simple reflection of what written life in Damascus looked like; they do not even reflect what dealing with the Prophet’s words and deeds in Damascus looked like. They are rather a highly biased and partial representation of what Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī wanted to commemorate, what he considered to be worthy of remembrance. The pre-Ottoman-period ḥadīth manuscripts in Damascus are thus not random texts with some arbitrary classmarks – they are the leftovers of a highly conscious project by one solitary scholar in the late Mamluk period.

Binding Matters – From Stand-alone Booklet to Monumental Composit Manuscript

In the previous chapter we considered Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s monumentalisation project by looking at the collection as a whole. This chapter zooms in on the individual manuscript, on the ‘thing’, especially from the perspective of manuscript bindings – a topic that might sound rather esoteric for a full chapter, but that is, as will become clear, indispensable for understanding Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s project. This chapter will revisit the main question dealt with in the previous chapter, namely what was the significance of this act of monumentalisation, and will enrich it with a focus on the material side of things. This link between the materiality of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s book collection and his monumentalisation project will be discussed from three principal angles: the shape of the manuscripts; the layout of manuscript notes; and archival practices. The main methodological contribution of this chapter is to undertake the first interpretation of a pre-modern Arabic book collection from the angle of material philology. In doing so, it has two main argumentative lines. On the one hand, it shows that scholarly agency was in this case not primarily situated in authoring new and ‘original’ texts, but rather in reworking the manuscript’s materiality. On the other hand, this chapter argues that the material change from booklet to composite manuscript was a decisive watershed in the cultural significance of these texts.

The Composite Manuscript as a Research Problem

The vast majority of texts in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection were post-canonical ḥadīth collections and I have described their materiality so far with the term ‘booklet’. These booklets of between just five and twenty folia were generally unbound because of their small size. One really has to think of a pamphlet to visualise them; a term such as ‘manuscript’ evokes associations that are far too grandiose for these very modest and cheaply produced items and even ‘booklet’ is too formal. The closest contemporary term for booklet is juz’ and many titles in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī fihrist do indeed carry this term. However, this term was ambiguous and juz’ could also refer to a ‘part’ or ‘volume’ of a larger text or to what has been called an ‘intermediary between the quire and the whole book’ consisting often of several quires, but not being a whole book.¹ The juz’ booklet as defined here, by contrast, hardly ever consists of more than one quire and always carries a self-contained text. Youssef Eche who worked in the 1960s with very similar material used in his study the term ‘brochure’ to refer to what I call ‘booklet’ here. However, when he explicitly defines ‘brochures’ he assumes that they are always part of a larger text, which is emphatically not the case here.² By contrast, Doris Behrens-Abouseif suggests the term booklet for ‘karrāsa’,³ but this does not work for the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī fihrist where ‘karrāsa’ is rarely used and if it is used it exclusively refers to parts (probably quires) of incomplete texts.⁴ As is so often the case, juz’ is a highly contingent term and its meaning in a specific book list or narrative text can generally only be understood when looking at the materiality of the manuscript.

These scruffy booklets are poles apart from the splendid luxury manuscripts produced for elite consumption with select paper, fine bindings, exquisite mise-en-page and often illustrations. These booklets are very thin and small, made of unimpressive paper and rather than having a proper binding, they merely have wrappers (as we will see further down).⁵ In terms of size, they are typically no more than twenty centimetres in height with a width of no more than fifteen centimetres and are often as small as 12.5 × 8.5 cm.⁶ They have a distinctively plain appearance and different kinds of paper are often randomly used within the same booklet. It seems that at the moment of production whatever was lying around in the household, madrasa or atelier was used.⁷ When the paper was cut, straight edges and right angles were of little concern and having sheets of the same size was not a priority. In turn, sticking to the same number of lines on each page is the exception and we see that this rough appearance also made subsequent users deal rather roughly with the page: marginal and interlinear comments are written in with very limited concern for the original ‘mise-en-page’.⁸ Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī himself was very much at home in this messy material world and his own works beautifully fit the overall profile of the ‘books’ he collected on his shelves.

However, we generally no longer encounter these scruffy booklets in their original materiality when librarians in special collections rooms of modern libraries hand the requested items over to us. Rather, what we are given are quite hefty manuscripts that contain five, ten or even twenty of these texts in one single volume, in a composite manuscript. Binding these booklets into composite manuscripts has to a large extent tamed their unruly and individualistic appearance. The materiality of these texts has thus been fundamentally altered at one point in their trajectory and one central contention of this chapter is that it was Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī who was to a large extent responsible for this alteration of the Damascene booklets. It was he who embarked on a massive binding project as a crucial part of his monumentalisation project: not only was the sum of the texts that he collected meant to function as a monument, but also each individual volume, each individual object, stood as a monument in its own right.

To begin, let us turn to a composite manuscript, entry number 399 in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī fihrist, to illustrate what such a codicological unit looked like in practice. As with virtually all these manuscripts, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī introduces this entry in his fihrist with the term ‘majmū’ in distinctive display script and then enumerates its eighteen titles (Plates I.1 and II.28). Entry number 399 is today, in a slightly altered form, in the National al-Asad Library with classmark MS3817. Four of the booklets mentioned in

Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s list (399a–c and 399l) have become separated from the main manuscript over the course of the last 500 years (we do not know exactly when, but we will return later to detached booklets).⁹ When comparing the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī entry number 399 with composite manuscript MS3817 it is evident that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, as in virtually all cases, took great care to list the booklets in their effective order in the composite manuscript – we will see in Chapter 5 how important this is for matching entries in his fihrist with extant manuscripts. Different authors composed these eighteen works between the ninth and the twelfth centuries, but the actual booklets were without exception produced in the early heyday of post-canonical ḥadīth scholarship in Damascus. In terms of fields of knowledge covered by this composite manuscript, the profile is fairly typical: among them ḥadīth is best represented (fourteen titles) and the other fields represented are closely linked with it, such as paraenesis and a biographical work.

The individual booklets are for the most part not explicitly dated and their colophons are in a rather basic format, often not mentioning the scribe or place of copying. Yet in most cases the numerous transmission notes at least give us terminus ante quem dates that all fall into the late twelfth or thirteenth centuries. The transmission notes also give a very clear indication as to the geographical circulation of the booklets, which was without exception in Damascus. Finally, in several cases the notes allow the scribes to be identified (sometimes identical to the ‘author’ or rather ‘compiler’). They are all known Damascene scholars, such as Ismā‘īl Ibn al-Anmāṭī (d. 619/1222), Ḍiyā’ al-Dīn al-Maḡdīsī and Muḥammad Ibn Hāmīl al-Ḥarrānī, so not only the booklets’ circulation, but also their production in Damascus can be postulated.¹⁰ As we have seen, this Damascene production context is very typical for the material that ended up in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī manuscript corpus. The booklets’ subsequent geographical circulation context can be established with even more precision as many of the transmission notes carry place names. Here we see that they circulated not only in Damascus, but that more specifically they tended to gravitate around the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter. For instance, scholars first read the text of booklet number 399e in the mid-thirteenth century in the Ashrafiya Dār al-Ḥadīth of this quarter and some hundred years later we see a note for the Ḍiyā'īya Madrasa/Dār al-Ḥadīth in the same quarter;¹¹ booklet number 399i circulated first in the centre of Damascus, but then also moved up the slopes of Mount Qāsyūn towards the Ḍiyā'īya.¹²

The example of entry number 399/MS3817 shows the numerous layers of historical information inscribed into these objects. Scholarship has routinely consulted Arabic composite manuscripts, but they have rarely been the object of dedicated study. Some scholars have taken a more profound interest in them, such as: Franz Rosenthal who published a description of a 'one-volume library' of philosophical and scientific texts; Georges Vajda who dealt with an Ottoman 'bibliothèque de poche'; and James Kritzeck who described a philosophical multiple-text manuscript.¹³ Yet these articles were mostly on a descriptive level without discussing in any depth whether the character of the manuscript in question was a composite manuscript (a codicological unit made up of formerly independent units) or a multiple-text manuscript (a codicological unit worked in a single operation by one scribe). While they offered tantalising comments on broader issues related to the production, circulation and reception of these manuscripts, the manuscripts' multiple-text character was not yet the focus of scholarly interest – the terms 'composite' and 'multiple-text' manuscript themselves had not even been developed at this point.¹⁴ And while we have by now comparatively good handbooks for the study of Arabic manuscripts, they too have relatively little to say on such manuscripts.¹⁵

Moreover, modern library catalogues of Arabic manuscripts have rather side-lined composite and multiple-text manuscripts as objects of physical significance. If they have been catalogued at all, they have more often than not been 'ripped apart' in the sense that each individual text was given its entry in the respective alphabetical or thematic (law, mathematics, philosophy and so on) category. In this way, the manuscript's materiality and the interplay between its texts has been obliterated, or at least side-lined, and the individual entries often did not even cross-reference the other texts in the same manuscript. Just as we find aspects of this approach in the seminal catalogues of the late nineteenth century (such as Wilhelm Ahlwardt's catalogue for the Staatsbibliothek Berlin) it is also found in catalogues published in the twenty-first century (such as 'Abd al-Sattār al-Ḥalwajī's dedicated catalogues for manuscripts with multiple texts in the Egyptian National Library, the Dār al-Kutub, in Cairo).¹⁶ The latter encompasses some 3,000 pages of wonderful descriptions of individual texts in alphabetical order – yet the reader looks in vain for an index that would enable the identification of texts belonging to the same codicological unit.

There are laudable exceptions that broke away from this practice and preserved the manuscripts' material integrity, such as the excellent three catalogues on majmū's for the National al-Asad Library in Damascus by Yāsīn al-Sawwās, Otto Loth's catalogue of the Arabic manuscripts in the India Office or Efraim Wust's catalogue of the Yahuda collection in Jerusalem.¹⁷ Here the criterion for ordering the texts has indeed been the manuscript as a physical object. Such catalogues do not only represent a wonderful resource for anybody interested in manuscripts beyond their textual content, but we see in the detailed entries that the cataloguers themselves started to see the manuscripts as much more than just neutral carriers of given texts. In light of the absence of a dedicated scholarly interest and appropriate resources, we are thus far from having an overview of Arabic multiple-text and composite manuscript practices that would facilitate the understanding of regional and thematic differences (practices seem to vary in fields as diverse as mathematics, Koran commentary and history) as well as diachronic change.

The Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī corpus thus provides a wonderful opportunity to dig into a large group of composite manuscripts delineated in time, space and context. This collection throws the issue of composite manuscripts at us with vehemence, as it has a striking number of volumes with multiple texts: out of the 579 entries in his fihrist, 48 per cent are manuscripts with multiple texts and the remaining 52 per cent are single-text manuscripts. This is in striking contrast to the Damascene Ashrafiya Library from the late thirteenth century, the other main documented Arabic library prior to 1500: here single-text manuscripts constituted the overwhelming majority, 92 per cent, of the entries.¹⁸ Even more impressive is to consider the number of titles: out of the 2,917 titles in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī fihrist, 90 per cent are in manuscripts with multiple texts. We do not have numbers on the relative distribution of single and multiple-text manuscripts in Arabic manuscript cultures more generally in order to set the 48 per cent figure into a wider context. In consequence, I can only rely on my experience of working with manuscripts from the National al-Asad Library (the main deposit for Damascene manuscripts, but obviously not the only one) where 70 per cent would be a realistic estimate for single-text manuscripts. At any rate, it is safe to argue that the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection had – seen against the wider context of Damascene manuscript culture – a remarkably high number of manuscripts with multiple texts.

What is even more striking is that all these manuscripts were composite manuscripts and not multiple-text manuscripts. For the Ashrafiya Library we do not have a comparable dataset because significantly fewer extant manuscripts can be confidently matched to its entries. Its catalogue is also not of help on this matter as it did not differentiate between the two formats, but simply used – in line with contemporaneous terminology – the umbrella term majmū‘ for both formats (best translated in this context as ‘miscellany’). For Arabic manuscript cultures in general, we not only lack a figure for single-text manuscripts, but also we are even further from a figure for the distribution of composite and multiple-text manuscripts. However, from my own experience of working with material from Damascus, composite and multiple-text manuscripts are fairly evenly distributed. That composite manuscripts represent almost half of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection and that multiple-text manuscripts are all but absent are thus two phenomena that require explanation.

¹⁸ Hirschler, Medieval Damascus.

A Life of their Own: Ḥadīth Booklets as Independent Codicological Units

Having seen what composite manuscripts are and how dominant they were in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection, the next step here is to make the case that the booklets had indeed been independent codicological units in the previous stages of their life cycle and that we can indeed ascribe their binding into large volumes to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī. We are still far from having an in-depth understanding of binding techniques of ‘Islamic’ manuscripts with an eye on regional differences and diachronic change. Karin Scheper has made a very strong case for how inadequate our terminology still is when talking about the binding of manuscripts and to what extent the ‘technical study of Islamic manuscripts is still in its initial phase’.¹⁹ In addition, the work that has been done to date specifically on the Mamluk period has – understandably – focused on aesthetically outstanding manuscripts that were generally single-text manuscripts produced for the court or in proximity to it.²⁰ As we are not at a point where book archaeology has provided us with the tools to confidently date bindings, the following will focus on contextual evidence to advance the argument that the composite manuscript was not the original material shape of post-canonical ḥadīth booklets. In order to argue that these booklets rather started their trajectory as independent codicological units, two main points will be discussed: the phenomenon of multiple title pages; and manuscript notes indicating their ownership status.

We have repeatedly seen that post-canonical ḥadīth scholarship was very much embodied by the multitude of transmission notes that we find on these booklets and that this line of scholarship lived and breathed the documented transmission of texts. In material terms this means that manuscripts are overflowing with notes and we have also seen that these transmission notes were usually placed at the end of the text, though manuscript users could also opt to use the title page (quite often) or the pages of the main text (rarely). The proliferation of such notes led to a practice that is most useful for showing that these booklets had a life of their own before they went into the composite manuscripts: in many cases, after users had filled the available space, they were forced to add an additional sheet (bi-folium) around the booklet whenever they needed to create space for more notes at the end.

Laying this additional sheet around the booklet did indeed create the desired space at the end. Yet, at the front of the manuscript it had the unintended, but unavoidable, effect of creating what I call a ‘secondary title page’ (by adding the first bi-folium), a ‘tertiary title page’ (by adding the second bi-folium) and so on. Figure 3.1 shows a booklet consisting of only two bi-folia and Figure 3.2 shows how the addition of a further bi-folia led to the creation of a new page at the end and in the front – and thus allowed for more space at the end for further transmission notes, but also created the conjoint secondary title page. These additional title pages were in a sense quite a drawback for the manuscript owner and its users as they covered the original – and generally quite lovingly produced – primary title page with a blank folio. Manuscript users in Damascus responded to this problem by writing the title on this new blank title page once again (though much less lovingly). Plates I.10 and I.11 give an impression of how different a primary and a secondary title page of the same booklet can look. Even though the aesthetics differ between these title pages, they fulfilled the same practical function: subsequent users could easily tell what text the booklet contained via this secondary (or tertiary and so on) title page(s). It has to be underlined that the terms ‘primary’, ‘secondary’ and so on refer to the temporal succession in which these title pages were added, not their order when opening the manuscript. The user of this manuscript would thus first encounter the quaternary title page, then turn the page to see the tertiary, then the secondary, then the primary and finally the actual text.

What happened at both the end and at the front is highly relevant for understanding the stand-alone period in these booklets’ life cycles, but we will focus here as a first step on the front. Multiple title pages have not yet caught the attention of modern scholarship and we do not even have a terminology for them yet. Even in the catalogues on these manuscripts, the cataloguers have generally not taken the multiple title pages seriously as part of the physical object. In the otherwise excellent catalogues on majmū’s for the National al-Asad Library in Damascus, for instance, the page ranges

Figure 3.2 Same booklet as in Figure 3.1 after users added one bi-folium below (or rather outside) the original two bi-folia to create additional space for manuscript notes (fol. 6a/b), inadvertently creating a new title page (fol. 1a). Adding this new bi-folium also means that the foliation numbers changed, so that what used to be fol. 2b now becomes fol. 3b. As foliation numbers were virtually absent during this period, this did not present a problem for contemporaries. Based on: Gacek, Vademecum, p. 210. © Brill/Adam Gacek given for each item only cover the main text including the primary title page, but they systematically exclude the secondary (and further) title pages. These additional title pages were seemingly not seen as significant elements of the codicological unit and just omitted. When looking at the catalogue for the first time there are so many holes that one has the impression one is looking at a Swiss cheese.²¹ Similarly, editors of such texts have generally not considered these additional title pages to be worthy of mention, let alone discussion.

²¹ FM/1, FM/2, FMMU.

What is of relevance to us here is that it can be generally ruled out that such sheets were added at the point of producing the original manuscript. The rather shabby-looking secondary title page would have undermined the whole purpose of the much more carefully produced original primary title page. We have some cases where a further bi-folium was added at the point of production, but this is the exception and it was generally a case of bad planning on the part of the scribes; in other words, they realised towards the end of the text that they had used too few bi-folia at the outset. In such cases they would have had to add another bi-folium (or several bi-folia) to make space at the end for more main text and thus inadvertently also created a secondary title page. However, the rare instances of such ‘scribal secondary title pages’ can be easily detected as the bi-folium in question always carries main text at the end. By contrast, the bi-folium added in the context of the ‘user-driven secondary title page’, which is of interest for our purposes, always carries notes at the end.

Users who added bi-folia to create more space for manuscript notes generally used paper sheets. Yet, we also see a second set of practices where users added parchment sheets. This was not done to create more space, but followed primarily a material logic, namely to provide the small unbound paper booklets with stable wrappers. This was necessary because these booklets remained unbound, as it would have been much too expensive to furnish each of them with a proper binding. Reusing parchment sheets, by contrast, was much cheaper and it gave them some kind of protection against the vicissitudes of a booklet’s life, which included water spillages, inattentive users ripping off the front page, and being stuffed into bags. As the writer of a Damascene parchment manuscript produced as late as the early sixteenth century prosaically stated, ‘parchment withstands what paper does not withstand’.²² The exercise of adding protective wrappers is obviously also a modern practice, as beautifully shown by manuscript Princeton, Garrett 3879y, which was entry number 233g in the fihrist. This booklet became detached from Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s composite manuscript and has remained unbound ever since. In response, a Princeton University ‘inter-office correspondence’ sheet was loosely laid around it and the title written on it, turning it into a secondary title page (Plate I.12). We find similar practices in other libraries such as in Damascus, where manuscript number 4511 (entry number 404e in the fihrist), which had also become detached, is wrapped into a paper sheet with a Zāhirīya letterhead.

The medieval Damascene reuse of parchment sheets to produce protective wrappers comes in a variety of different shapes and forms. Regrettably they cannot be discussed in much detail here as they took place in the heyday of post-canonical ḥadīth transmission and are thus not a major concern for understanding the meaning of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s endowment project. These reuse practices are so rich and intriguing that they require and deserve a study of their own. We find, to name but a few, parchment fragments of Arabic legal documents (especially those related to marriage), Greek liturgical texts, Latin hymns, Hebrew commentary literature, as well as bibles in Georgian, Syriac and Armenian. The reuse of these fragments has preserved an entirely new corpus from the Damascene manuscript culture of the pre-paper era.²³ Looking beyond Damascus, Joseph Sadan published an estate inventory from the Cairo Genizah that lists the household furnishings and instruments of a scribe and manufacturer of manuscript books. Among the items listed was also a ‘majalla’ that Sadan identified as a parchment roll. This roll, listed between a copper ruler and an inkwell, baffled him as parchment had been long replaced by paper as the main writing material.²⁴ Though there is no conclusive proof, it is at least possible that this parchment roll was used to cut sheets for reuse purposes.

To illustrate the phenomenon of added bi-folia, let us take again composite manuscript number 399/MS3817, more specifically booklet number 399i/MS3817–7, a small booklet with ḥadīth transmitted by the Damascene scholar Hibat Allāh al-Akfānī (d. 524/1129). The original, independent codicological unit consisted of only three bi-folia that were as usual nested together, folded and sewn to produce a six-folia quire. In the composite manuscript we now count them as folia 66 to 71, but in the original independent codicological unit they were obviously just folia 1 to 6. Folio 1a (today folio 66a) was the primary title page (Plate I.10) and between folia three and four

²⁴ Sadan, Nouveaux documents, pp. 53–4.

(today folia 68 and 69) we see the sewing thread in the centre of this quire. At the end of this booklet, folio six (today folio 71) was left blank at the point of production to accommodate what the producer knew was to come: a barrage of transmission notes. Inevitably, subsequent users of the manuscript started to fill this void starting at the top of folio 6a (folio 71a) with a note dated 595/1199, turning over the page to gradually fill folio 6b (folio 71b) (Plate I.13) until in the year 704/1305 they reached the end of this folio and thus the end of the booklet's capacity to accommodate more notes.

In response, a manuscript user laid an additional fourth paper bi-folium around the existing quire to create new writing space. This user must have cut the original thread and then sewed the newly enlarged quire with a new thread (we hardly ever find double threads). Thereby two new folia came into being, one at the front and one at the back of the quire, the new conjoint folia 1 and 8 (today folia 65 and 72 respectively). S/he used the new folio at the front for a rather unspectacular secondary title page (Plate I.11) and the space at the back – the real reason for undertaking the whole exercise – was duly filled with transmission notes. The users again start at the top of new folio 8a (today folio 72a) with a note dated 707/1307 (neatly taking up from the last note on the previous folio that was, as we have seen, dated 704/1305), fill the page, turn over the page and continue up to the year 786/1384 on the bottom of folio 8b (folio 72b). After this point no further paper bi-folium was laid around this booklet as its transmission must have come to an end. The protective parchment wrapper that we find today as the conjoint folia 64 and 73 was not used for manuscript notes and I suspect that it was added to the booklet at the same time as the additional fourth bi-folium, that is in the year 707/1307.²⁵

If we move away from example 399i/MS3817-7 and think about this practice more generally, it is logical that adding an additional bi-folium, let alone several bi-folia, around a booklet would have been simply impossible had it already been bound into a larger composite manuscript. It would have been a major undertaking to undo the stitching and binding of that manuscript. Once these booklets were bound into large composite manuscripts, users rather resorted to a different practice, namely pasting in single folia. This was much easier to do and had the added benefit of not creating an undesired conjoint title page. The phenomenon of multiple title pages is thus very much the material embodiment of these booklets circulating independently and is intrinsically linked to this stage of their life cycle. They are an easy and practical solution that Damascene manuscript users (and certainly those elsewhere as well) came up with when they were acting in a material world of small-scale booklets. Such booklets certainly existed in other fields of knowledge as well and they certainly continued to exist, but the practices of post-canonical ḥadīth scholarship urgently required new material answers. The rise of this new line of scholarship not only meant that many more miniature booklets came into existence, but also that they circulated at great speed. They were carried between madrāsas and mosques, they were brought to neighbouring villages and they could easily travel between cities. Post-canonical ḥadīth booklets were a highly mobile species and thus especially vulnerable to the vicissitudes of life. In addition, their spaces were so quickly filled with transmission notes that they were also a fast-growing species. Owners and users of post-canonical ḥadīth booklets thus added parchment wrappers and paper sheets to protect highly mobile booklets and to create new space for notes.

We have seen how multiple title pages show that these booklets had separate trajectories prior to being bound into composite manuscripts by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, but there is a second conspicuous element that also shows this to be the case. Manuscript notes illustrate how booklets that are today in one single composite manuscript had different owners or sat in different endowments at an earlier stage in their life cycle. In order to employ manuscript notes to historicise composite manuscripts we need to differentiate between two groups of notes, ‘textual notes’, which are not useful for our argument, and ‘legal notes’. Textual notes pertain to the production, reception and transmission of the text and include reading notes, collation notes and, especially in the case of ḥadīth texts, transmission notes. These notes are not helpful for dating the shift from booklet to composite manuscript because manuscript users continued to read and transmit texts of individual booklets even after they had gone into composite manuscripts. They thus continued to add textual manuscript notes with reference to the individual booklet even once it had become part of a composite manuscript. I have not yet come across a textual note that reflected the material change from booklet to composite manuscript, for instance a note referring to all or at least several booklets in a given composite manuscript. Employing textual notes for an entire composite manuscript would indicate that this specific combination of texts had started to be perceived as a veritable textual unit. This would have been more appropriate for multiple-text manuscripts where reader communities had started to see the texts as one single unit and thus also started to copy them as one unit. In our corpus, however, the textual notes remain unchanged.

Legal notes on ownership, loan, sale and endowment, by contrast, are an entirely different story. They do change once the material shape of the booklet is modified from independent codicological unit to being part of a composite manuscript. While a user can continue to read and transmit individual texts from a composite manuscript, he or she can no longer separately own, sell or endow these booklets. Rather, legal notes have to refer to the whole composite manuscript as this is the physical unit that was owned, sold or endowed. To show how such legal notes can help us to understand the life cycle of booklets, let us return to entry number 399, respectively MS3817 in the National al-Asad Library. Among the fourteen texts that are extant in MS3817 (remember four other texts mentioned in entry number 399 became separated), thirteen carry endowment notes. All these endowment notes refer to the Ḍiyā'īya Madrasa/Dār al-Ḥadīth in the Ṣāliḥīya Quarter and one might thus be tempted to think that these booklets already formed a single physical unit when they were endowed in the early thirteenth century.

However, there are several factors that speak against such a shared trajectory so early in their life cycles. Firstly, these notes are all written on the respective title pages of what were at that point independent codicological units and they were thus most likely endowed to this madrasa as independent objects. Secondly, and much more importantly, those notes mentioning the endower's name (not all of them do) refer to two different individuals: the above-mentioned founder of this madrasa Ḍiyā' al-Dīn al-Maqdisī, who died in 643/1245, and Muḥammad Ibn Hāmīl al-Ḥarrānī who died in 671/1273 (Plate I.14 shows one of his notes).²⁶ Furthermore, other notes that do not mention the endower by name come in a wide variety of different formulas and hands, indicating that they were most likely not part of either the Ḍiyā' al-Dīn or the Ibn Hāmīl endowments, but were endowed by other individuals. As we have seen, book endowments by different individuals retained separate identities after having been placed a library. The various endowment notes on composite manuscript MS3817 show that its independent codicological units could thus initially not have been part of one and the same manuscript. The wide variety of endowment trajectories of booklets that are today in one composite manuscript runs through the entire Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī corpus. To take one other example, entry number 461, today MS3796 in the National al-Asad Library, contains ten separate works. Of these, one item was endowed into the Dār al-Ḥadīth al-Ashrafiya (entry number 461a) and the other items were all endowed in the Ḍiyā'īya by no fewer than five different endowers.

The Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī collection drew heavily on manuscripts that had previously been endowed in the Ḍiyā'īya Library, some fifty percent of the ḥadīth booklets in the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī corpus had at some point been endowed in this one library. However, if we start to listen to their individual stories, we see that each one of them has its own highly idiosyncratic trajectory of multiple endowments and returns to market circuits. Simply saying that they were Ḍiyā'īya manuscripts and became part of Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's endowment would be way too simplistic a description. To take one example, entry number 539f, today MS3754/11, was endowed into the Ḍiyā'īya by 'Alī b. Mas'ūd al-Mawṣilī (d. 704/1304), a prominent endower to this library. However, some two generations later this booklet was once again endowed (most likely again into the Ḍiyā'īya) by 'the children of Ibn al-Muḥibb' (most likely 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Muḥibb, d. 736/1336) – and this is the only booklet in composite manuscript 539/MS3754 that has this trajectory. The children must have purchased this booklet, which seemingly had left the al-Mawṣilī endowment in the Ḍiyā'īya in one way or another. This booklet had thus been endowed at least twice before it once again returned to the market and fell into the ownership of Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī who then endowed it once again, this time into the 'Umarīya Madrasa as part of a composite manuscript. We do not have sufficient space here to fully spell out the incredibly rich variety of trajectories in terms of legal status (private ownership and endowment) of the booklets in the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī corpus.

Suffice to say that an analysis on the basis of composite manuscripts will lead the student into an impasse – these booklets have to be primarily analysed in terms of their original material shape, as independent physical objects.

In addition to multiple title pages and legal notes, there are further indicators for the stand-alone stage in these booklets' life cycles, two of which I will briefly mention here. Firstly, that these booklets had independent trajectories over lengthy periods is evident from material damage; more precisely from different kinds of material damage to booklets in the same composite manuscript. For instance, in composite manuscript entry number 541, today MS3777, the title 541h, Fawā'id al-Khaṭīb, has fire damage on the upper end. Yet, neither the preceding title (541g) nor the following title (541i) show any such damage. As we can exclude miracles, the only explanation is that the fire-damaged booklet was bound together with the other booklets into composite manuscript entry number 541/MS3777 at a later stage in its life cycle. Interestingly, two other volumes of the same Fawā'id al-Khaṭīb are in the same composite manuscript, 541j and 541o, and both show similar fire damage to title 541h. These three volumes must have been kept in the same location and suffered the same damage when the fire occurred. Yet, when composite manuscript number 541/MS3777 was created, they went into positions eight, ten and fifteen, rather than being bound next to each other. To cite a second example, in composite manuscript entry number 531, today MS3846, the title 531j, Amālī Ibn al-Bakhtarī, shows substantial loss of paper in the lower end. All the folia of this booklet show exactly the same characteristic damage whereas neither the preceding booklet, 531i, nor the following booklet, 531k, show any such damage.

Further indicators of these booklets' independent circulation exist beyond the materiality of the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī corpus. For example, the thabat work by Ḍiyā' al-Dīn al-Maqdisī lists the rights of transmission he had received in the course of his lifetime for hundreds of post-canonical texts. In this fascinating 'diary' of practices of transmission rights from the heyday of post-canonical ḥadīth transmission, he repeatedly states who owned the booklet that carried the respective transmission note. In his entries, he only ever refers to owners of individual booklets, never to larger majmū'as. It is evident that the 'archive' of his rights, that is the notes on the manuscripts, was widely distributed across the urban topography of Damascus. It is probably not by chance that this archival guide to post-canonical ḥadīth booklets in Damascus also ended up in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s ownership and his endowment.²⁷ Taken together, the two phenomena of multiple title pages and legal notes, in addition to material damage and texts such as Ḍiyā’ al-Dīn’s ‘diary’, show beyond doubt that the composite manuscript was a later development in the life cycle of post-canonical ḥadīth booklets.

When Everything Changed: From Booklet to Composite Manuscript

While we now know that the booklets had independent trajectories, the next step is to show that the majmū’isation of these booklets was indeed undertaken by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī. This is again far from straightforward methodologically and such a decisive material change in the life cycle of a large corpus has not been discussed with reference to Arabic manuscripts to date. However, for the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection we are in the fortunate position that this large corpus of composite manuscripts has by now a shared trajectory of 500 years and the starting point of this corpus is documented in a medieval book list, the fihrist, that provides a terminus ante quem date (c. 897/1492). Without this list the extant manuscripts could have only been attributed a terminus post quem dating on the basis of the last dateable text combined with a rough estimate on the basis of the binding.²⁸

In the case of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī corpus, the above-discussed phenomena, endowment notes and multiple title pages allow the chronological window for when the binding occurred to be further narrowed. As we have seen, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī got his hands on an enormous number of booklets that had once been in the Ḍiyā’īya Madrasa/Dār al-Ḥadīth and there is no other Damascene library in his collection that comes even close to the prominence of former Ḍiyā’īya manuscripts. The reason that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī owned and endowed so many Ḍiyā’īya manuscripts in the first place was that this library had been repeatedly subject to theft by some of the city’s scholars and to plunder, especially during the Ilkhanate invasion of Syria in 699/1300. If we are to trust the narrative sources, the process of Ḍiyā'īya manuscripts returning to the book market (this, not destruction, was the typical outcome of plunder and theft) did not start before the year 699/1300, but was by then in full force.

²⁸ A typical example of such a dating is Schmidt, One-Volume-Libraries for MS Leiden, University Library, Or. 644.

We are thus able to narrow down the period when the process of majmū'isation occurred to between 699/1300 (at the earliest) and c. 897/1492 (at the latest). This is more than we know for most other Arabic composite manuscripts, but two centuries are still far too wide a period to ascribe this process to any specific actor(s). Here, the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī corpus puts us again in a most auspicious position with its numerous added bi-folia to accommodate dated transmission notes. The date of these notes, more precisely that of the first one on an added bi-folium, allows us to pin-point when this happened. Once such a date has been ascertained it can be assumed that the booklet was at that point still an independent codicological unit. As seen above, it is highly unlikely that bi-folia were added to booklets after they had gone into a composite manuscript. If we return once again to entry number 399/MS3817 we see that the users of 399g/MS3817-5, for instance, had to add a secondary, tertiary and quaternary title page. This highly popular manuscript acquired its final, additional bi-folium, the quaternary title page, in the year 770/1369, the date of the first transmission note on this added bi-folium. That 399g/MS3817-5 was still an independent booklet at this point is further corroborated by the place where this 770/1369 reading session took place, the Ḍiyā'īya Madrasa/Dār al-Ḥadīth, where it had been endowed as an independent object. Looking at the overall Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī corpus from the angle of the date of the first transmission notes on added bi-folia, it is evident that the process of majmū'isation cannot have taken place before the late fourteenth century; that is, it occurred at some point between c. 780/1378 and c. 897/1492. Some 120 years is still quite a long period, but we are getting there.

Against this background, we can look at the evidence pertaining to this time span, and Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī emerges as the main player. The first indicator of him having received the booklets as independent items are again legal and textual notes. For instance, when we take entry number 517, today MS3819 in the National al-Asad Library, we read on one of the booklets the statement: ‘Yūsuf b. Ḥasan Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī bought this booklet [juz’] aware that it had been endowed [previously] [and] it was rescued by the purchase. He swears by God that he returned it to the endowment status hoping that God the Almighty would reward him as he had rewarded the first endower.’²⁹ This statement clearly only refers to this one booklet (juz’) that he must have bought separately from the other booklets in the same composite manuscript where we do not find any such notes. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī thus must have bought that booklet in isolation from the other codicological units that were to later constitute composite manuscript number 517/MS3819. We find similar legal notes referring to previous endowments on other booklets that ultimately went into his composite manuscripts.³⁰ We also have a parallel case where Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī underlines for one booklet that ‘the other [booklets] are endowments’.³¹ In addition, we have purchase notes, such as the one mentioned above referring to the trinket market, which again indicate that he had purchased booklets as individual objects that later became part of composite manuscripts.³² Finally, there are transmission notes that involve the handing over of the actual physical copy of the text from teacher to student (munāwala). Here again we see that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī received individual booklets, not composite manuscripts.³³

The second main indicator that shows that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was responsible for reconfiguring the material format of the texts are those that he authored and bound into these composite manuscripts. In the first instance this refers to his own booklets, which suddenly pop up in the middle of composite manuscripts. In these cases, we have the standard diet of earlier texts, but then we suddenly find one of his own works, clearly indicating that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī himself must have produced that composite manuscript in the form that he later endowed and registered in his fihrist. For instance, entry number 502 consists of nine texts, most of them earlier texts, but in the fourth and seventh positions we find booklets by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī. In the same vein, entry number 505 has a total of eleven texts with authors from between the ninth and twelfth centuries, but in the eighth position once again we suddenly find a booklet by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī. In addition, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī did not only bind his own booklets into the composite manuscripts, but also a range of documentary material in his own hand. In Chapter 1 in particular we saw that documents such as the ‘business deeds’ he issued and signed went into his composite manuscripts. Moreover, there were book-lending lists, and money ledgers that were not written on existing folia, but were bound into manuscripts.

The third indicator of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s agency is a further intervention in the booklets’ materiality. He himself added additional wrappers/title pages to booklets – continuing the practice of previous manuscript owners and users. To securely ascribe such an intervention to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī is difficult because we no longer have transmission notes at the end that would have helped to date when the bi-folium in question was added. However, there are some cases where a – slightly protracted – argument is possible to show Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s involvement. For instance, in entry number 543o, today MS3839/14 in the National al-Asad Library, the Ḥadīth Abī ‘Alī Ḥamza b. Muḥammad, we find the main text on folia 204 to 209. Folium 203 at the front and its conjoint folium 210 at the back are one single bi-folium that was laid around this booklet as a protective wrapper. We know that this wrapper had formerly belonged to another title, namely number 399l, the booklet Iṣlāḥ al-ghalat fi al-ḥadīth, as it still carries that title. When Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī received 399l it must still have carried this protective wrapper, as he wrote beneath the title ‘in his hand’ (bi-khattīhi) denoting that it was an autograph. For reasons unknown to us (perhaps 543o was in urgent need of a protective wrapper) Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī removed it from 399l and then sewed it upside down around 543o. It could only subsequently have gone into the composite manuscript.

The fourth indicator of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s involvement, and this really is the smoking gun, are the book covers of the new composite manuscripts. The standard book covers of manuscripts of that period consisted of pasteboards covered with leather or other material. In Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s time the pasteboard typically consisted of layers of sheets of paper glued one on top of one another. And here Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s wonderfully characteristic book hand proves most advantageous. For instance, if we take manuscript Paris BNF Supplément Turc 984 we see that the pasteboard was produced from reused paperwork by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī himself: in the upper cover we see on the inner side a fragment from one of his money ledgers (Plate I.15). For the outside cover he went for the cheaper option and rather than using new leather he reused a Hebrew parchment bi-folium, which gives the outside of the new composite manuscript a very peculiar aesthetic. A second example is entry number 544, today MS3798 in the National al-Asad Library, where we see two paper slips with drafts of his works on the pasteboard of the upper cover.

Finally, the bindings of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī corpus show a high degree of consistency in several regards, indicating that they must be seen as one ‘binding corpus’.³⁴ Most remarkably, the composite manuscripts in his corpus were not the work of a professional binder. Those manuscripts that are today outside Damascus and that I have been able to view have a distinctively unimpressive appearance. The leather on the outside of the binding, for instance, was not specifically treated, coloured or decorated to serve as book covers; there are none of the geometric figures, pointed stars, lobed circles, almond-shaped medallions or stamps that you might expect to see for this period. Rather, what we see are reused parchment sheets from disused books with traces of the original texts, such as Hebrew in the case of Paris BNF Supplément Turc 984 or Arabic in the case of Paris BNF Supplément Turc 983 (Plate I.16). The book cover material is strikingly similar to the protective wrapper material and Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī most likely moved wrappers that had become detached or had lost their function from the booklets to the outside of the new composite manuscripts.

In the case of Paris BNF Supplément Turc 983 we see that this parchment had once been the protective wrapper of a ḥadīth booklet, with parts of the title (10th part of the ḥadīth of al-M.j/h/kh ...) and the final letter fā’ of the word ‘endowment’ (waqf) still visible. This was most likely the protective wrapper of entry number 461e, today MS3796/6 in the National al-Asad

Library. Producing covers by reusing parchment sheets that had already been reused as wrappers of booklets was not just an efficient and cheap solution; it reproduced the visual appearance of the old booklets on the outside of the new composite manuscripts so that future manuscript users would know what kind of material to expect. One might read them as the visual markers of post-canonical ḥadīth texts – not too dissimilar from the iconic Penguin covers for paperbacks from the 1930s onwards. Returning to the non-professional workmanship of late medieval Damascus, we see on Plates I.15 and I.16 that these reused parchments were rather roughly glued onto the pasteboard. Even more striking is the stitching of one of the composite manuscripts that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī produced (Plate I.17) and does not even closely resemble a professional binder’s work. Overall, it is highly likely that the composite manuscripts were produced in the household of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī rather than in a professional workshop. This decision to opt for home-made bindings might have been first and foremost an expression of the close emotional relationship between the books and their owner as well as a distinctive aesthetic programme, but it might also be taken as a further indicator that money was not unlimited in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī household.

At this point it is important to insert a caveat to the line of argument so far. We have a very solid body of manuscripts for which it can be shown beyond reasonable doubt that they were bound by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī (his own works bound in, his paperwork bound in, his fragments used in the binding). However, we do not have the same degree of certainty with regard to all of the composite manuscripts in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī corpus. In fact, in some isolated cases it is highly likely that they were bound as composite manuscripts at an earlier date, such as entry number 525, today MS3768 in the National al-Asad Library. However, this composite manuscript is also the odd one out in terms of its overall profile: it contains unusually homogeneous booklets. For a start every single one of the twenty booklets was written by the same scribe, and cross-references in the transmission notes show that these booklets had a very close trajectory from the thirteenth century onwards.³⁵ Such cases are, however, clearly outliers and it is remarkable that we see Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī noting for one of the books in his fihrist that it is ‘in black leather’, as if to say that a binding that he himself did not undertake was noteworthy.³⁶ Nonetheless, the combination of above arguments makes it more than likely that the vast majority of the composite manuscripts in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī corpus were bound by him (or in his household).

Building Monuments and Safeguarding the Past

Having established Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī as the creator of the vast majority of composite manuscripts in his corpus, let us now have a more detailed look at one such composite manuscript by way of example. This will enable us to understand Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s textual logic in creating this enormous mass of new books and the rationale behind the monuments he created. Entry number 477, today MS3753 in the National al-Asad Library, is a composite manuscript of nine booklets plus fragments that can be disregarded for the purpose of the present discussion. In creating this new book Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī has a very clear focus in terms of content: eight of these booklets are post-canonical ḥadīth collections and only one booklet (477d) comes from a different field, theology. The booklet that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī chose as the first one, the entrance to his book or monument, was fittingly a ḥadīth booklet by one of the great forefathers of the community he wants to commemorate, Ḍiyā’ al-Dīn al-Maqdisī: a collection of his traditions with short lines of transmission (‘awālī). On the first page (folio 1a) the manuscript user encounters immediately an endowment note for this booklet to the Ḍiyā’iyya Madrasa/Dār al-Ḥadīth by Ibn Hāmīl al-Ḥarrānī, whom we have already seen as a major endower to this library. To drive home the point on Ḥanbali-Ṣāliḥiyyan ḥadīth scholarship, the first transmission note in this booklet evidently documents a reading in the very same madrasa (folio 17a).

The next item chosen by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī (477b) takes the user back to the eleventh century when Damascus was not yet such an important centre of ḥadīth scholarship. However, this booklet is a collection by al-Ḥusayn b. Muḥammad al-Ḥinnā’ī al-Dimashqī (d. 459/1066–7), one of the more prominent Damascene ḥadīth scholars of this period. When opening this booklet, which has three title pages, one once again encounters an endowment in the Ḍiyā'īya, this time by Ḍiyā' al-Dīn himself, thus harking back to the first text. The more than twenty-five transmission notes in this booklet solidly integrate the text into the Damascene world of post-canonical ḥadīth transmission dominated by the Maqdisīs, including one of Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's direct ancestors, Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Hādī. The subsequent two theological titles are not mentioned by Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī in his fihrist because they were highly fragmentary (a total of seven folia) and can be disregarded here as he himself disregarded them in his fihrist. Suffice to say that they were again transmitted in the standard Maqdisī milieu. The next major item (477c) brings us again back to the first item as it is another ḥadīth work by Ḍiyā' al-Dīn al-Maqdisī, again endowed into the Ḍiyā'īya by Ibn Hāmīl. The next item on theology (477d) has already been mentioned above.

The subsequent major item (477e) returns the reader to the eleventh century with the third part of the Thaqaḥfiyāt collection by al-Qāsīm b. Faḍl al-Thaqaḥfī (d. 489/1096). This work was of crucial importance for Damascene ḥadīth scholarship and we find several other parts in Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's composite manuscripts. He himself authored a collection of ten ḥadīths selected from this work.³⁷ This copy of the Thaqaḥfiyāt had once again been endowed in the Ḍiyā'īya and its transmission notes take us to the usual sites on Mount Qāsyūn, including the Muẓaffarī Mosque. Items 477f and 477g take the user even further back into the tenth century with collections by the transmitters Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Wāḥid Ghulām Tha'lab Abū 'Umar al-Zāhid (d. 345/957) and al-Ḥasan b. Aḥmad al-Makhladī (d. 389/999). Endowment notes and transmission notes once again firmly tie these two works to the Mount Qāsyūn. The next item (477h) takes us back to the beginning of the golden age of post-canonical ḥadīth transmission in Damascus with a collection by 'Alī Ibn 'Asākir (d. 571/1176). This booklet was trickier to claim as belonging to his community as it had no pertinent endowment and transmission notes so Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī very prominently wrote his own transmission notes on the title page – a phenomenon that we will discuss in more detail further down. The exit gate of this manuscript (477i) takes us again back to the eleventh century with a collection by ‘Alī b. ‘Umar al-Qazwīnī (d. 442/1050–1) with a final nod to the Ḍiyā’iya via an endowment note.

To fully unpack the meaning and significance that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī bestowed on one such composite manuscript, as is evident from the choice of booklets with various texts and endowment and transmission notes, as well as the order of these booklets, would require a full chapter. The example of entry number 477/MS3753 clearly shows that we are not dealing here with some random combination of texts, but with a clear compilatory agenda. As we have repeatedly seen, the vast majority of the texts in these new books were not written by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, but it was he who set them into an entirely new material context and it was he who thus created entirely new webs of meaning between texts and notes. The agency of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī really resides in these binding decisions and in the creation of these hundreds of new books. Each of these composite manuscripts was a crucial part of his overall agenda to create this monument of texts and he repeatedly noted with evident self-satisfaction in his fihrist at the end of a composite manuscript ‘and it is one of the precious [books]’.³⁸

Creating these monuments of composite manuscripts had a very immediate material rationale and this brings us to the safeguarding component of his project: many of these booklets were at this point in an extraordinarily poor state some several centuries after they had been produced. Time had taken its toll on these fragile paper booklets in numerous ways and the parchment wrappers that were added in many cases did not always prevent damage. We have already seen that several items had burned pages. The very facts that they were texts for transmission and highly mobile objects led to further damage such as ripped and lost pages. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī tried to repair this damage and we see him undertaking restorative work by gluing strips of paper over tears (it was most likely him because he reused paper with his own script for this repair).³⁹ However, many booklets were in such poor condition that little could be done. If the first page was missing, he merely put his notes – those that he usually put on the title page – on what had by then become the ‘first page’ or what might be called the ‘negative’ primary (or secondary, tertiary and so on) title page.⁴⁰

In many cases Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī built his monuments from nothing but incomplete fragments where the majority of the text, and the notes, had already been lost. It is probably this material that he bought on the trinket market as it was too damaged to return to the book market, but too sacred to go to the paper market. A wonderful example of this is composite manuscript entry number 544, today MS3798 in the National al-Asad Library. In his fihrist, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī did not list many of its ‘booklets’, probably as he himself was no longer sure what texts they actually carried. It is not surprising to see the modern-day cataloguer of this manuscript stating with some exasperation that ‘many of its treatises are incomplete or have water-damage and some have burned pages’.⁴¹ In this one composite manuscript we thus have: a booklet missing first pages (3798/1, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī did not list it); a booklet missing last pages (544b, 3798/3); a booklet missing first and last pages (3798/19, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī did not list it); a booklet of only one page (3798/18, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī did not list it); a booklet with the few remaining pages in the wrong order (3798/14, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī did not list it); a booklet with both water and fire damage (3798/16, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī did not list it); a booklet with only transmission notes remaining (3798/20, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī did not list it), and so on. In another composite manuscript we find again fragments of texts that he did not record in his fihrist. However, we do see that he wrote notes on the actual fragments highlighting why they mattered to him – ‘It is in the hand of Ibn Rajab’ and ‘hand of Ḍiyā’ al-Dīn’ – because they were traces of some of his grand scholarly heroes of the past.⁴² Yet, in some cases the booklets were in such a bad state that he could not even identify the author or the title and had to note his guesses on the manuscripts’ margins.⁴³

That his safeguarding and monumentalisation mission was urgent is not only evident from the material damage to the booklets, but also from the fact that so many of them only represented one of what used to be several volumes. We will see in Chapter 5 that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī took extraordinary care in his fihrist to note down when he only had the fourth, the tenth or the thirty-second part of a given work. A large section of his collection consisted of nothing but these incomplete sets. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī did not buy pristine and shiny books (other than occasionally); the vast majority of these booklets were damaged and fragmentary – they were at the very bottom end of manuscript culture in Damascus. His monumentalisation project was thus also very much an attempt to salvage rapidly deteriorating material objects that were on the verge of being lost forever and many of them had already been lost. To put it anachronistically, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was also on a cultural heritage safeguarding mission.

A striking feature of this rescue mission was in a sense to rebuild the collection of the Ḍiyā’īya Library. That this library features so prominently as a previous site of endowment is certainly linked with the fact that it had simply been one of the central sites of the Ḥanbali-Ṣāliḥīya scholarly world in which the Maqdisīs had featured so prominently. It is thus not very surprising that so many of the post-canonical ḥadīth booklets had gone through this library, even though its characterisation as ‘one of the most important libraries in the world’ might seem over the top.⁴⁴ It has yet to be explained why so many of its endowed manuscripts were available on the book and trinket markets of Damascus in the first place. As we have seen, its library had been dismantled – at least in part – on account of warfare during the Ilkhanate invasion of Syria in 699/1300. Chroniclers quickly started to remember this event as the moment of the library’s destruction,⁴⁵ yet, as so often, the outside invader’s destruction was seemingly not as profound as presented in the narrative sources. Otherwise it is difficult to explain how subsequent scholars, such as Ibn Ḥajar in the fourteenth century, could still take off to Cairo with ‘several loads’ of endowed books.⁴⁶ From Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s words (as quoted by Ibn Ṭūlūn) it rather appears that the Ḍiyā’īya had gone through a difficult period in his lifetime, not too different from the ‘Umarīya Madrasa, and that books started to be taken out of the library in larger numbers and sold on the markets.⁴⁷ However, despite experiencing large-scale theft the ʿUmarīya continued to function until the nineteenth century. Its history in the Ottoman period remains to be written and the best we have to date is unreferenced statements by Muḥammad Duhmān.⁴⁸ And we do know that Ottoman court registers still mention this madrasa in the year 1255/1839.⁴⁹

In the early sixteenth century this library was still alive, at least Ibn Ṭūlūn claims that he bought ‘some 2,000’ of its books on the markets and returned them to the library.⁵⁰ Yet, there is no doubt that a lot of its books and booklets had previously been bought by other buyers. This is where Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī comes in, as he must have systematically bought the books that were available. It is noteworthy that he explicitly describes these purchases as ‘rescuing’ in the manuscript notes that we have seen above.⁵¹ Yet, he did not return these manuscripts to where they belonged, the ʿUmarīya Library, but rather chose to rebind them and place them into a new library, the ‘Umarīya. This was in contrast to what his student Ibn Ṭūlūn later did, when he returned ʿUmarīya books and also when he rescued Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s books, which his sons had been selling, and returned them to the ‘Umarīya. That Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī had few qualms about endowing books that had previously been endowed is also evident from a non-ʿUmarīya example in his collection. When he lists entry number 59 in his fihrist, he states that this is an ‘ancient endowment’ (waqf qadīm). However, when we look at the actual manuscript, today MS Yahuda 306 in the National Library of Israel, we see that it was only copied two generations before him, which makes it a relatively young object in his corpus. Furthermore, the endowment notes (folia 153b and 309b) show that it was endowed fewer than twenty years before his own endowment – not exactly an ‘ancient’ endowment. Furthermore, it had been endowed in the ‘Umarīya Madrasa. Yet, rather than returning it to the sub-collection where it belonged, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī made it part of his own book collection in the very same library.

I follow here the interpretation of Liebrecht, Rifāʾiya aus Damaskus, p. 177.

Whether dealing with endowed books in such a way is illegal or not is not our main concern here. What matters is that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī opted to put the Ḍiyā’īya manuscripts into the ‘Umarīya Madrasa, which was for him the most appropriate place for his monument. In hindsight he was right as the ‘Umarīya Madrasa was the only functioning Mamluk madrasa when the new Public Library was set up in 1878. In effect he had successfully grounded the booklets in a library where they were to remain for some 400 years. In the previous two to four hundred years of their existence these booklets had gone through many changes in their ownership status and found themselves within ever-changing corpora, sometimes in private ownership and sometimes in an endowment. A standard trajectory of such Ḍiyā’īya manuscripts could be envisioned as follows: private ownership; Ḍiyā’īya endowment; private ownership; Ḍiyā’īya endowment; private ownership; private ownership Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī; private ownership ‘Abd al-Hādī; private ownership Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī; Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī / ‘Umarīya endowment; private ownership book dealer; private ownership ‘Abd al-Hādī; private ownership Ibn Ṭūlūn; and finally ‘Umarīya endowment. This ‘finally’ is evidently not final for those books that left the ‘Umarīya endowment before 1878, for which we have to considerably prolong the trajectory.

Binding the Ḍiyā’īya booklets into the new composite manuscripts and placing them into the ‘Umarīya meant that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī had no intention to ever return them to the Ḍiyā’īya. Rather, he aimed at creating a new monument that was also a monument to the Ḍiyā’īya itself, one of the three central sites of the Ḥanbali-Ṣāliḥīya scholarly world in its Maqdisī form. The majmū’isation of thousands of small ḥadīth booklets was in many ways a deeply melancholic act. To end their circulation as independent units acknowledged that new textual practices had emerged, a new age of scholarly engagement with the words and deeds of the Prophet – an age that consigned the booklets he owned to a large extent to oblivion and the trinket market. Binding these codicological units into composite manuscripts ended their life cycle as actively used texts that were continually transmitted in a post-canonical mode. Certainly, further transmission would have been possible even after this act. Yet, the binding signalled that the owner did not expect that any further space for manuscript notes would be needed in the future and the absence of any such notes post-Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī shows that demand to transmit these texts in accordance with post-canonical protocol was indeed low. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s majmū‘isation project was not meant to ‘kill off’ actively used texts; it was a melancholic admission that a specific culture of textual engagement had come to an end.

Before placing these monuments of a line of increasingly outdated scholarship into their new home, he reconnected them for one last time to their glorious past. This is where the ritualistic reading sessions in his household gain their full meaning. This binge-reading marathon was meant to bid farewell to these texts with a rite de passage inaugurating a new stage in these booklets’ life cycles. Most importantly, these reading sessions were structured by the new material form of the booklets in composite manuscripts: the daily reading diet typically consisted of the texts in one of these composite manuscripts being read out. As we have seen, these composite manuscripts had most likely been bound in the household itself, so there was also a very material connection between the reading communities of the household and the book. This binding project must have been completed before the year 897/1492 when Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī took these new books into his hands to transmit them one last time according to the old protocol.

Inscribing Oneself into the Monuments 1: ‘Stamping’ the Book

Apart from binding the booklets, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī undertook another massive and systematic intervention into their materiality, namely altering the layout of the title pages. Speaking of layout in connection with Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī might seem counter-intuitive in light of his rather peculiar book hand and his rowdy mise-en-page. However, the issue here is not the layout of the actual text, but the layout of his manuscript notes. As seen in the previous chapter, manuscript users tended to put notes at the back of the manuscript, especially those textual notes that documented the scholarly transmission of the text in question. By contrast, legal notes pertaining to ownership, sale, endowment and so on were generally placed on the title page(s). Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī entirely broke with this convention and, whenever possible, put his transmission notes in the most prominent position possible on the title page.

In that sense his notes are a double break with the conventions of the past: they were unusual in that they were often only claims to rights of transmission without details on how he or his teachers received these rights (as we have seen in Chapter 2) and they were unusual in the way they were placed on the manuscript. It is clear that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī had a very clear programme that set his notes apart from the tens of thousands of other transmission notes that had been written on Damascene manuscripts in the preceding centuries. His notes must be read as one further crucial element in the monumentalisation project – one that deeply inscribed him into this monument.

Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī not only placed his notes in a very unusual place, but they also followed a unique convention that he himself seems to have made up. Firstly, and most strikingly, he puts an isolated al-ḥamdu li-llāhi (God be praised) on top of the actual note, a feature that we only very rarely find in other Damascene transmission notes of the Mamluk period. On Plate I.9, for instance, we see this phrase at the top of the note in the lower half of the page. This is not just any pious phrase that he added, but his personal motto, his ‘alāma, which he also used in his function as notary witness when he produced legal documents. This legalistic framing of his transmission notes was supported by a second characteristic peculiar to his notes, namely the use of a signature. The standard way to identify the scribe of a given transmission note was to simply insert the phrase ‘and its scribe XY’ in the list of those who attended the session when the writer mentioned his own name. Alternatively, the scribe could identify himself towards the end of the note (typically between date and final invocation) with ‘and it [the note] wrote XY’.

Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, by contrast, used a consistent layout that put his name in a much more prominent position – it is always the very last element of the note. In addition, he introduced a line break, whenever space on the page permitted, and if any space remained on the previous line, he filled it by elongating the final letter ‘bā’ of the previous ‘kataba’ ([this] wrote ...) to make sure that his name (signature) stood on a line on its own. His signature not only always appears as the final element of the note and generally on a line on its own, but he furthermore indented that line to really drive this point home (see Plates I.11 and I.18). Even in those cases where we have notes that do not refer to transmission, he signs them with his name. For instance, entry number 422f, today MS3791/10 in the National al-Asad Library, carries no transmission note by him (works of fiqh generally carry far fewer transmission notes). Yet on its protective wrapper we find a note that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī used fairly frequently, one in which he alerts the reader to the fact that the booklet in question is an autograph. These notes are very brief, ‘in his hand’ (bi-khattīhi), but even here Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī made sure that he signed with his full name. His characteristic signature, distributed all over the booklets, recollects, like the motto, the characteristic signatures used by notary witnesses on legal documents.⁵²

The effect of using motto and signature was to move his transmission notes into the legal realm and this goes hand in hand with the above-mentioned placement of these notes. This can best be illustrated by looking at one example: entry number 399d, today MS3817/1 in the National al-Asad Library, is a typical ḥadīth booklet that consisted of just two bi-folia (folia 1 to 4 in the composite manuscript). When it reached Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī a further bi-folium had already been added to make more space at the end for transmission notes (folio 5),⁵³ thereby also creating a secondary title page (folio 0, Plate I.18). Even though folio 5b still had enough space for Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī to add his transmission note where convention would have had it (at the back), he opted for the most prominent position possible, right on the secondary title page that the previous manuscript users had left blank. One of the previous users had only written a very modest title in the top left-hand corner in tiny script and a legal note that this manuscript had been endowed to the Ḍiyā’iya Madrasa/Dār al-Ḥadīth. The striking visual effect of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s note on what was formerly a fairly blank page is somewhat diminished on Plate I.18 on account of the modern additions to the title page (library stamp, classmark and foliation).

The significance Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī ascribed to his notes is also evident from the fact that he sometimes puts on the first page a very brief ‘reference note’ that summarises the content of a note that he had to place, for lack of space, on a folio further in the booklet. For instance, entry number 543n, today 3839/13 in the National al-Asad Library, was so severely damaged by fire that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī had no chance of squeezing his transmission note in on what was left of the title page (folio 181a). What he did do was to write a brief reference note on it, (‘This read Yūsuf b. Ḥasan b. ‘Abd al-Hādī as it is inside’),⁵⁴ and indeed fourteen folia later (folio 195b) we find the fully fledged transmission note in the margins of the main text.

⁵² Müller, Der Kadi und seine Zeugen, pp. 287–91.

⁵³ Based on the first transmission note on top of fol. 5a this happened in the year 638/1240.

The prominent placement of his notes and their quasi-legalistic character was part of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s strategy to fully appropriate these books as physical objects. His textual (transmission) notes thus played at the same time – quite uniquely – the role of legal (ownership) notes. That Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī opted for this strategy is linked with an issue that baffled me during the first years of working on this corpus: the almost complete absence of ownership notes by him and the complete absence of any notes referring to his endowment. Leafing through an isolated manuscript from the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī corpus, one would recognise that he had transmitted the text, but in the vast majority of cases there would be no indication whatsoever that he had actually been the owner of the book or that he had endowed it. Had it not been for the survival of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī fihris, arguing in favour of the existence of an Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī corpus and of him having indeed been the owner of these manuscripts would have been a very lengthy affair.

As these transmission notes were a very distinct strategy to claim ownership of books, they can be seen as fulfilling the same function as stamps. Arabic book culture had not yet started to use stamps during his period; they were only to gradually appear in the Ottoman period, but the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī notes are as close as one could get – highly standardised in layout, always written in the same hand and as far as possible placed in the same space they are a formidable set of ex-libris stamps. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī worked with considerable speed when writing these notes and one gets the impression that he was quickly working his way through the booklets. Ink blots on facing folia are thus a recurrent feature as he did not always wait for the ink to dry before turning the page.⁵⁵ In fact these blots are such a recurrent feature that one can use them to reconstruct notes by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī when the folio with the original note has been lost.⁵⁶

The major point with regard to these ‘stamps’ is that beyond the scholarly level (transmitting knowledge to the next generation) and the legal level (claiming ownership), there is a further, much broader level of significance inscribed in these notes. As much as the *majmū‘isat*ion of Damascene ḥadīth booklets was part of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s monumentalisation project, his transmission notes were meant to write himself (and his family members) into this project by bringing these texts to life once again for a short period before sending them off for their next life cycle. This monument was first and foremost aimed at remembering the past of Ḥanbali-Ṣāliḥiyan scholarship, but Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī made sure that his signature, as the ‘signature’ of its creator, was visible from every possible angle when looking at this monument.

Inscribing Oneself into the Monuments 2: Bookish Archives

Writing himself into the new books via his stamp-notes is closely linked with the final aspect discussed here for the purpose of understanding Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s binding project – that his new books were also sites of his archival practices. We have already encountered some of the documentary material that he bound into the composite manuscripts. The prime example of this is entry number 483, today MS3784 in the National al-Asad Library (Plates I.2, I.3 and I.4). This manuscript includes a fairly standard diet of ḥadīth booklets produced in Damascus, generally in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, some of which carry the typical endowment notes of the Ḍiyā’iyya Madrasa/ Dār al-Ḥadīth and involve the usual suspects such as Ḍiyā’ al-Dīn al-Maqdisī as authors and transmitters. What is remarkable in this manuscript is that it contains a significant amount of documentary material that was produced by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī himself. In this manuscript we find the previously mentioned documents that provide an insight into Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s diverse sources of income, including a money ledger, lists of books he had lent out and the documents he drew up as a notary witness, such as an estate inventory and a document relating to the sale of a property.

What is more striking is that these newly inserted documents often had no material function, which is in marked contrast to the creation of new pages and protective covers that we have previously seen. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī did employ some of the documentary material found in entry number 483/MS3784 for practical purposes, such as the estate inventory that functioned as a protective (paper) cover for entry number 483e/MS3784–6. However, we also have several items that he sewed into the middle of the quire, such as a sale document on a small slip of paper in item 3784/2 (Plate I.2) and a receipt for rent for the year 884/1479, again on a small slip of paper, in item 483d/MS3784–5, that have no material purpose whatsoever. In other words, previous users had sewn into the booklets reused paper and parchment sheets with a material logic (new pages, protective covers) and – as I believe – an archival logic that for the sake of brevity cannot be discussed here.⁵⁷ Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, by contrast, primarily included the material as part of his archival practices and with much less material logic.

It is important to underline that we deal indeed with newly inserted material and not with notes that were written onto existing folia. The latter practice would have indicated a notebook usage of blank spaces in a book – again an archival practice, but one of a different material nature. That Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s archival material was newly inserted is evident from that it is either of an entirely different format (sewn into the middle of a quire) or its writing is turned by ninety degrees to the writing in the manuscript and runs over the quire fold. In the latter case this makes it impossible that the new text was written onto an existing blank folium, as this would have required the quire’s other bi-folia to be lifted – a very awkward manoeuvre.

The ways Damascene individuals dealt with various kinds of documentary material is significant for the current discussion on the archive in medieval Middle Eastern history. Searching for clearly identifiable archival spaces, linked with clearly identifiable institutions, has more often than not ended in lamenting the absence of the archive for the Middle Eastern context. However, as discussed in the Introduction, recent scholarship has turned, in El-Leithy’s words, ‘towards a historical anthropology of medieval

Arabic archives'⁵⁸ and has refocused specifically on archival practices.⁵⁹ What we see in the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī manuscripts is exactly the kind of material that we have been looking for in vain when searching for the archive: sale and rent documents for real estate (the only other Damascene corpus comes from the Genizah-style Qubbat al-khazna in the Umayyad Mosque), estate inventories (none are known from pre-Ottoman Damascus), money ledgers (again unknown) and so on.⁶⁰ Most fascinatingly, while many of these manuscripts have been well catalogued and a substantial number of individual texts, never the composite manuscript in its entirety, have been edited, none of the editors involved saw this material worthy of a more sustained inquiry.

However, Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī and previous users of the manuscripts clearly saw them as appropriate repositories for documents. In the case of the small slips of paper, Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī must have cut open the quire's original thread, inserted the document and re sewn it. Fascinatingly, this 'book archive' provides insights into how paperwork was kept in late medieval Damascus. Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī had several sources of income and these various activities engendered considerable amounts of documentation, much of it certainly of short-term use and thus quickly discarded. However, he created the book archive as a repository for several pieces for which he envisioned longer archival life cycles. Plate I.4 shows the debt list where we see that this was work in progress as some of the entries were crossed out. The use of a book archive for 'private' business activities is noteworthy and a new facet of archival practices, but the really fascinating bit is that he used this repository also for material that one would have expected to be preserved in a juridical context. For instance, the estate inventory was the key piece of paperwork produced to determine the value of a deceased person's assets. This in turn was central to assessing possible taxation and settling the shares among those entitled to inherit.

Settling inheritances was a murky business with ample opportunity for those involved to manipulate the process to their advantage. It is not by chance that most of the documents that were brought together in the corruption case against a Jerusalemite judge in the late fourteenth century were estate inventories in which this very judge had been involved.⁶¹ That we find an inventory in one of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s book archives shows that archival practices were widely dispersed over the topography of a city such as Damascus. Even though scholarship is increasingly moving towards the idea of a juridical archive in the pre-Ottoman period, it is evident that other archival practices and spaces existed in parallel.⁶² In documentary material from medieval Syria, apart from the Ḥaram al-sharīf corpus, we thus encounter individual archival actors who had a strong interest in preserving documentary material, but did so outside clearly identifiable and stable places.

The use of the newly created composite manuscripts as a site of archival practices for his own paperwork has also to be seen in the framework of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s wider monumentalisation project. Binding this material into these books was clearly a long-term decision where he expected the documents to remain part of the book for posterity. These documents would thus be a reminder and the signature of who was responsible for creating these monuments. Furthermore, it can be argued that these archival decisions once again harked back to the glorious past. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī knew his booklets very well and he was doubtless aware that many of them had themselves been sites of archival practices in the heyday of post-canonical ḥadīth transmission, when so many marriage-related documents found a new life as protective wrappers. In a way, binding in his new set of legal documents can be seen as a nod to the rich documentary legacy of Damascus in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries that the booklets themselves carried. Just as he reused parchments for the outside of his covers and just like his stamp-notes, his archival practices were a very distinct strategy to connect himself with the glorious past he wanted to commemorate.

Conclusion

This chapter has looked at the monumentalisation project of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī from three angles with a focus on the individual codicological unit. It has shown that he decisively intervened in the material form of these booklets, most importantly by creating a large set of new books. This allows us to extend the argument on the elements making up this project. In Chapter 2 we saw that these elements included (1) the collection's highly curated profile, (2) reviving dormant texts, (3) framing the fihris as a 'visitors' guide', (4) conducting the transitory ritual of binge-reading sessions and (5) placing this collection in the 'Umarīya Madrasa. On the basis of looking at the materiality of the individual book in this chapter we can add three further elements: (6) with his massive binding endeavour, he transformed the small booklets into the entirely new material form of large-scale composite manuscripts; (7) Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī used a highly idiosyncratic legalised transmission note in order to stamp his books and thus prominently write himself into this monument; and (8) he underlined this point with further material intervention by binding his own textual material (booklets and documents) into the new books. The Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī collection was thus to a large extent a library that was not only carefully built-up to preserve the past but also preserved the past in a musealised form in which it had not hitherto existed. As with most projects to safeguard what starts to be defined as 'cultural heritage', the very process of safeguarding reshaped the material itself.

⁶¹ Müller, Der Kadi und seine Zeugen.

⁶² Müller, The Power of the Pen substantiating the arguments of Hallaq, Qāḍī’s dīwān.

Chapters 2 and 3 have thus brought together the different elements that make up what became a long-lasting, and thus highly successful, monument. Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's monumentalisation project operated on two levels. On the one hand, the collection as a whole functioned as a monument and this is very much what the first five elements of the monumentalisation project are about. On the other hand, it operated on the level of the individual book by creating large-scale composite manuscripts, stamping and binding in Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's own texts (6, 7, 8). The most striking element of Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's monumentalisation project, and its central axis, is indeed the format of the composite manuscript, the majmū'. This triad majmū' - library-monumentalisation brings us back again to the emergence of stand-alone libraries in eighteenth-century Ottoman Istanbul, mentioned in the conclusion to Chapter 2. While this has no historical link with the context of Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī, the generic point does offer once again a useful way of thinking about his collection. As Yavuz Sezer argued, in Istanbul we see also a 'paradigmatic relationship' between the majmū' and the building of a physical library to memorialise its founder. During the the age of Çelebis-‘Gentlemen’ and majmū’s in the seventeenth century, the majmū’ became a highly popular mini-library catering for new and eclectic reading tastes. As much as these books were carefully compiled to combine appropriate selections, the new libraries had a very curated quality to them. Contemporaries were aware of this link and one sultanic library is thus called a majmū’ ‘made with meticulous selection’.⁶³

The binding decisions of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī for each and every one of his new books reflected the book collection as a whole: on both levels we see a carefully selected corpus of texts reflecting a specific historical moment. As much as the entire Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection was a monument to this past, each composite manuscript was carefully built up and curated to tell the grand narrative. And just as the overall corpus of Mamluk-period ḥadīth manuscripts in Damascus is not a random collection but the leftovers of a highly conscious project, every single one of these composite manuscripts is not just ‘a’ collection of texts, but again the result of a highly conscious project by one solitary scholar in the late Mamluk period.

Conclusion: The After-life of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī Collection

We saw the logic of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s monumentalisation project in the previous chapter. This one first turns to what happened with the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection after the fifteenth century and then offers general conclusions. For the first part we return to a central and repeatedly raised question, namely how to explain why of hundreds of endowed book corpora in medieval Damascus, just a single corpus actually survived as a corpus in Damascus. Why did hardly any of the hundreds of books by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s student Ibn Ṭūlūn stay in Damascus, yet most of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s books did stay? There is no doubt that the shelves in Damascus contain remnants of other book endowments, but I have not yet seen any other pre-Ottoman corpus that is remotely as large as that of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī. The only other known large-scale corpus is that of the Ḍiyā’īya, but virtually all of its manuscripts have reached us via the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection. It is also evident that the shelves in Berlin, London and Princeton contain remnants of medieval Damascene book corpora (and of many other cities), but these have been even more reconfigured than those in Damascus as they went through the circuits of manuscript and antiquities markets in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. During this voyage many collections were reshuffled and individual books were even broken up into smaller pieces; it will take outstanding dedication to sort out their messy stories.¹

Manuscript Trajectories beyond Theft

The after-life of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s bookish monument was evidently closely tied to that of the ‘Umarīya Madrasa. Yet, as with many libraries its history in the Ottoman period has still not been written. What we do know is that it existed until 1878, but for the almost 400 years from Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s lifetime onwards most of what we get in narrative sources are once again stories of plunder and theft. Ibn Ṭūlūn, for instance, reports that the supreme judge took whatever books he wanted out of the ‘Umarīya Library in the year 937/1530.² Some 200 years later the chronicler Ibn Kannān reports that the ‘Umarīya’s administrator in the early eighteenth century had stolen hundreds of the library’s books and many others were lent to scholars who never returned them.³ Finally, we have reports that in the early nineteenth century a group of Najdī scholars took several camel-loads of books from the ‘Umarīya after bribing its administrator.⁴

Yet there must be more to the story of this library than 400 years of plunder and theft; if not it would be a terribly drawn-out and somniferous story of an institution’s demise. Rather than just buying into these stories of misappropriation and theft it is much more helpful to look at the actual manuscripts in order to trace the fate of collections in Ottoman Damascus. Boris Liebreuz has done much work in this regard and has brought up many cases that do not lend themselves to linear stories of decline. For instance, a manuscript of the biographical dictionary Wandering Stars (al-Kawākib al-sā’ira) by al-Ghazzī had been endowed by As‘ad Bāshā al-‘Az̄m in the mid-eighteenth century and the ‘Az̄m family was certainly the main player in the library landscape of that period. This book is today in the National al-Asad Library and one would have suspected a direct trajectory from one of the ‘Az̄m libraries into the new Public Library. Yet, strangely, this manuscript came from the ‘Umarīya Library, which may have been subject to plunder

but was nonetheless still apparently able to attract manuscripts.⁵ Another puzzling case is that of ‘Uthmān al-Kurdī who was the endower of a major library in the late eighteenth century. This person is entirely unknown and so is his library (this library most emphatically deserves a book) apart from the fact that it was one of the collections that went into the new Public Library in 1878.⁶ This ‘Uthmān al-Kurdī must have bought numerous books from the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection that were available on the markets and then re-endowed them into his own collection. Yet many of his books have come into the new Public Library not with his collection, as one would have expected, but with the ‘Umarīya collection to which they must somehow have returned at some point.

What these examples indicate is that rather than thinking in terms of theft and decline, it is more useful to start assembling a critical mass of data on manuscript movements in order to understand a very vivid and dynamic library landscape in Ottoman Damascus. Within this landscape there is no doubt that books from the ‘Umarīya and more importantly from the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī monument were available on the market, as is evident from the ‘Uthmān al-Kurdī episode alone. That Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s students bought books to re-endow shortly after his death shows that the eventful lives of these books started right after the endowment. Not all were re-endowed; the presence of a book from the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection in the Escorial Library today indicates that early on some of them travelled as far as Morocco, where it must have been before 1612.⁷ These movements do not require a long explanation unless one assumes – against all historical evidence – that endowment libraries had long life cycles.

What does require an explanation is rather the opposite, namely why so many of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s books stayed in the ‘Umarīya Library, making it the only large medieval library corpus that survived until 1878. For sure, many of the titles of his endowment are no longer there, over 50 per cent, and we will return to them later on. Yet, the hundreds of his books that were still in the library when it was transferred to the new Public Library show that there is something very unique about this collection. And this uniqueness takes us back to the monumentalisation story: large parts of this book collection were meant to celebrate a line of scholarship that had disappeared. While this collection very firmly faced the past it faced the future to a far lesser extent. Especially the ḥadīth books in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection were of limited interest to potential buyers in the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

That the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection is our only known extant medieval Damascene library corpus is not because it contained splendid books that were extraordinarily well protected, but precisely the opposite – it contained worn-out books that had fallen out of scholarly fashion. We have already seen that the absence of scholarly transmission notes on ḥadīth booklets in general from the fifteenth century onwards illustrates to what extent they had become outmoded. This is also evident from Ottoman-period curricula in madrasas in Damascus where we see the standard authoritative collections, but hardly any of the post-canonical material. In the same vein, Damascene estate records for the same period show that there were no post-canonical ḥadīth booklets in private libraries.⁸ This is particularly noteworthy as book ownership overall was increasing in the city during the Ottoman period, so the absence of a genre that had traction in the past is a particularly significant change.⁹

The best indicator that these books were out of tune with scholarly fashions is that virtually none of the books travelled to the centre of gravity for book movement in the Ottoman era, Istanbul.¹⁰ By contrast, as we have seen, virtually all identifiable books from the Ashrafiya Library went precisely to that very city where there was a hunger for books to stock new libraries. To understand scholarly fashions, we can take one of the few well-studied Ottoman libraries in Istanbul, that of Cârullah Efendi from the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries. Here we see the authoritative ḥadīth collections, we see the study manuals for ḥadīth, such as that by Ibn al-Şalāḥ al-Shahrazūrī, and we see commentaries – exactly what we do not find in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection. A collector such as Cârullah Efendi, who bought books in Damascus in person, had clearly no interest whatsoever in post-canonical ḥadīth booklets.¹¹

Another indicator of how unfashionable these books had become is from the 1878 dissolution of the ‘Umarīya Library: before the officials knocked on the door, its administrator had removed, as we saw in Chapter 2, what he considered to be the ‘choice books’. What he left, as we know from the first catalogue of the new Public Library, were basically Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s books – books that he did not consider of considerable monetary value or scholarly relevance. The administrator also left unbound quires and loose pages on the shelves. We will return to these in the next chapter when looking at the historical information encoded in the current classmarks of the National al-Asad Library. It suffices to say here that these unbound quires were again to a large extent leftovers of composite manuscripts from the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection.

We still do not have an overview of what happened to the field of ḥadīth studies with regard to post-canonical modes of transmission during the Ottoman period. Yet, what is evident is that the composite manuscript was not a widely popular material form. What we do see, by contrast, are multiple-text manuscripts, that is a codicological unit with several texts, but worked in a single operation by one scribe – a material form that in turn is absent in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection. To illustrate this point: one of the few books that I initially believed to have travelled to Istanbul was entry number 411, a composite manuscript of twenty-one legal texts by Ibn Rajab (d. 795/1392), as manuscript Fatih 5318 in the Süleymaniye Library had almost the same group of texts; however, upon opening this manuscript, it was evident that it was produced in an entirely different scholarly world where the entire manuscript was produced in one book hand and in one go (for instance the title often starts on the verso of the last folio of the preceding title) as one unit.

This consistent shape is a world apart from the cacophonous world of the composite manuscript with its different scripts, different papers and manuscript notes running wild. If we do find pre-Ottoman ḥadīth collections with multiple texts in the libraries of Ottoman Istanbul, these are again multiple-text manuscripts.¹² Even though we only have relatively few examples of such medieval ḥadīth multiple-text manuscripts, this was seemingly what buyers in the Ottoman centre were interested in. The dramatic shift to the multiple-text manuscript as the preferred material container for brief texts in the Ottoman period is also evident when we return to the case of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s close student Ibn Ṭūlūn.¹³ The core of Ibn Ṭūlūn’s book endowment in the same ‘Umarīya Madrasa was some sixty multiple-text manuscripts of his own writings – obviously strikingly different from the composite manuscript endowment of his teacher. And it might not be by chance that Ibn Ṭūlūn’s manuscripts all left the ‘Umarīya Madrasa before we get the 1878 snapshot of its holdings. Seemingly, buyers were interested in these books. The transition from composite to multiple-text manuscript in the field of ḥadīth during the late Mamluk and early Ottoman period is similar to changes we observe in other fields, such as documentary practices. When the new Ottoman rulers arrived in Damascus, we see that Mamluk-period paperwork is recopied and re-configured into new shapes. The most striking example of this is the early Ottoman endowment register for the Umayyad Mosque that brought the Mamluk-period inventory of this endowment, written a century earlier, into a new textual format.¹⁴

That the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī corpus has remained to a large extent in Damascus is thus primarily down to its relative insignificance in the eyes of the Ottoman marketplace. Yet, there is another factor that comes into the equation at a later date and that is the Ottoman foundation of the new Public Library, which was absolutely essential for the survival of this corpus. This foundation was very much a reaction to the massive presence of new European customers on the book markets in nineteenth-century Damascus and the Middle East at large. In Damascus, this led to massive purchases by the likes of Prussian consul Johann Gottfried Wetzstein. As seen in the introduction, he acted as the middleman for the sale of an entire private library to Leipzig, the Rifā‘īya, and his massive other purchases in the city constitute the largest collection of Arabic manuscripts within the Staatsbibliothek Berlin – arguably the largest library of Syrian manuscripts outside the Middle East. To cite another example, as a consequence of this massive intervention in the local manuscript market, 90 per cent of the manuscripts that had once been in the private library of an Aḥmad al-Rabbāt are today in libraries outside the Middle East.¹⁵

¹³ Wollina, Ibn Ṭūlūn’s Autograph Corpus. It would be interesting to test whether the popularity of multiple-text manuscripts during this period elsewhere (such as eleventh/sixteenth-century South Asia, cf. Bahl, Creating a Cultural Repertoire) indicates a wider transregional shift.

The history of nineteenth-century manuscript trade in the Arabic Middle East remains to be written, especially for Damascus.¹⁶ Yet, in our case it is clear that the European buyers were not able to get their hands on a larger number of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī manuscripts – or they had no interest in them. There are some Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī manuscripts in collections in Europe and the US (Map 4.1. shows the main trajectories of these manuscripts). Sometimes, it is possible to identify the buyer or at least the middleman, such as Wetzstein in Berlin or Abraham Yahuda (1877–1951) for manuscripts in Princeton, Chester Beatty and Jerusalem.¹⁷ Yet, looking at the small number of these manuscripts it is most likely that these were books that had already moved out of the ‘Umariya Library before the new buyers appeared on the scene and were not directly sourced from its library. This impression is confirmed by cases such as Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s own manual Baḥr al-damm, which is today in the Wetzstein collection in Berlin. An ownership note dated 1218/1804 by Ṣāliḥ b. Ibrāhīm b. al-Munayyir shows that this manuscript had returned to the market long before Wetzstein arrived in Damascus some fifty years later.¹⁸ Another such example is composite manuscript entry number 208 that is today in the Princeton collection as Garrett 273H. This manuscript carries on its title page, as we have seen, the note of a certain Ibrāhīm b. Sulaymān b. Muḥammad b. ‘Abd al-‘Azīz al-Ḥanafī who states that this book came into his possession in the year 1078/1667.¹⁹

Map 4.1 Trajectories of Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī manuscripts

Another noteworthy feature of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī manuscripts that went abroad was that they often did so in a fragmentary state, such as the Princeton manuscripts Garrett 3879Y (formerly the seventh booklet in composite manuscript number 233), Garrett 1851y (formerly the tenth booklet in composite manuscript number 405) and Garrett 1852y (formerly the eleventh part of the same composite manuscript number 405). All three of them reached Princeton as individual booklets and this was most likely their material form when they were sold in Damascus. One can easily imagine that they once belonged to the ‘unbound quires section’ in the ‘Umarīya Library and were thus material that was especially susceptible to be removed. This fits the statement of the Damascene scholar Ḥabīb Zayyāt, who published texts by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī in the 1930s on the basis of seventeen unbound and unordered folia that he had bought ‘long ago’ (qadīm^{an}) in the city.²⁰ Plate I.19 shows traces of binding fragments on the spine of the Princeton manuscript Garrett 1851y, another such booklet that had become detached from an Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī composite manuscript.

The final point on the movements of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī manuscripts from the mid-nineteenth century onwards is that it is only at that point that we see more manuscripts moving to Cairo. Just as there was little taste for them in Istanbul, Cairene book owners seemingly also had little interest in them. That we find manuscripts in the collections of Aḥmad Taymūr (d. 1930) and Aḥmad Ṭal‘at (d. 1927) reflects the fact that they were very much part of the same trading networks that fed books into the European and US markets. For instance, the book trader and scholar al-Madanī (d. 1898) played the central role in dispersing Ibn Ṭūlūn’s corpus, which had been in the ‘Umarīya Library, and sold manuscripts to libraries such as Leiden and Berlin. At the same time, he sold Ibn Ṭūlūn manuscripts to Aḥmad Taymūr together with some Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī manuscripts.²¹

What we have seen so far is that some manuscripts moved abroad, but that we do not have massive movements as is the case for many other collections. However, that leaves over 50 per cent of the entire Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī manuscript corpus unaccounted for. While I am certain that there are hardly any more manuscripts in the National al-Asad Library, there are surely many more manuscripts in Middle Eastern, European and US libraries that I have missed. However, it is highly unlikely that these will amount to hundreds, as such larger corpora would have certainly been identified by now. Most importantly, Boris Liebrecht has surveyed the ownership notes in Berlin, which houses so many Damascene manuscripts, and even here the number of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī manuscripts is very modest.

²¹ Wollina, Ibn Ṭūlūn’s Autograph Corpus.

The most striking phenomenon in the ‘absentee corpus’ is the prominence of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s own titles. A manuscript could be identified for only 17 per cent of the titles authored by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī. Yet the same number stands at 61 per cent for titles by other authors. What we thus have is a systematic drain of specific manuscripts out of the collection, not random losses. Yet with the current state of surveys of collections of Arabic manuscripts, especially of private collections of outstanding importance such as the Shāwīsh Library, it is too early to venture arguments as to what happened to the over 50 per cent of the titles from the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection that have disappeared from our sight. We know for instance that manuscripts once owned by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī are now in the Shāwīsh Library, but without a catalogue and restricted access such cases can only be verified once the manuscript in question is edited (see entry number 389). Torsten Wollina has recently shown with regard to manuscripts by Ibn Ṭūlūn how important private libraries of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries were for the dispersion, preservation and dissemination of manuscripts – and how little we know about them.²²

Yet, what is evident is that the new Public Library was highly successful in preserving one part of the ‘cultural heritage’ of Damascene manuscript culture. There is no doubt that the creation of this library was not such a major success if we consider the overall number of Damascene manuscripts that went abroad after its creation and if we consider how vivid the manuscript trade in Damascus remained. It remains indeed to be researched to what extent the foundation of this library actually brought about the very thing that it was meant to prevent: books being removed from endowed libraries and put on the market.²³ However, for the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection it was a decisive stage in extending the life cycle of many of its manuscripts within Damascus. It is tempting to see the foundation of the new Public Library as a result of an Ottoman policy to preserve cultural heritage, especially as there is an intensifying interest in archaeology during the same period.²⁴ Just as field projects by the Imperial Museum’s director Osman Hamdi Bey (d. 1910) showed a new relationship with historical artefacts, the manuscripts in the endowment libraries gained a new status as historical books to be cared for and to be placed in a ‘modern’ institution.

Conclusion

This book is quintessentially an analysis of life cycles of manuscripts. It has tried to show to what extent the books that sit on the shelves of the modern library today tell multifaceted stories of production, usage, ownership and endowment. While this book took the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī endowment as a point of entry, it has been equally interested in its components’ previous and subsequent life cycles. With his book endowment, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī wanted to preserve a past, for him the past. Yet, defining these booklets as objects to be preserved, to be remembered and to be musealised inevitably changed their meaning and changed their materiality. With its focus on the marginal (especially manuscript notes) and the material (especially bindings), one of the main contributions of this book is its insistence that these manuscripts do not directly and unproblematically reflect a past period of scholarship. Rather these books are intricate constructions that were meant to do something and are at least as complex to analyse as the texts themselves.

Starting to look at manuscripts in terms of life cycles and materiality has brought out one point that has repeatedly come up so far, but has not yet been fully conceptualised: the localised nature of manuscript culture. Each one of the composite manuscripts created by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was a unique item: they might be reproducible in terms of their content, but that was not what these books were exclusively about. These books were also written in the hands of the great scholars of the past, they bore witness to the scholarly topography of Damascus, they had been endowed in the splendid institutions of post-canonical ḥadīth scholarship and their transmission notes reflected unique chains. Every single one of these objects had its own localised story that another copy could never recreate.

The question of these books' local character can be conceptualised with reference to Sheldon Pollock's work on cosmopolitan and vernacular texts in the South Asian context. For Pollock, cosmopolitan texts are basically those that are meant to be 'unbounded, unobstructed, unlocated'.²⁵ These are texts that can easily travel across regions and be copied and reproduced in far-flung places. His main interest is how and why by the year 1500, trans-local languages became of lesser importance and writers started to express themselves increasingly in local languages.²⁶ Brinkley Messick has taken up and further developed the conceptual pair 'cosmopolitan-vernacular' for his work on highland Yemeni legal scribal culture in the early twentieth century. Here, he shows to what extent legal culture localised the outwardly cosmopolitan scholarly texts of jurisprudence (what he calls the 'library'). More importantly, localising these texts occurred to a large extent via the contingent 'archive', that is vernacular archival documents such as case records and notarial documents produced by local legal actors.²⁷

The ḥadīth texts that stood at the centre of this book constitute one of the most cosmopolitan genres one can think of. These texts recording the Prophet's words and deeds can easily circulate across vast regional distances and long stretches of time without undergoing major textual transformation. A collection of forty ḥadīths is thus on the surface equally intelligible for readers and listeners in the twelfth century as those in the present and this is true from Morocco to Bukhara. However, the recent introduction of the term 'post-canonical ḥadīth scholarship' has already alerted us to the fact that things have been significantly more complex. This has brought into focus that ḥadīth texts also have a vivid, diachronic dynamic and underwent substantial transformation both in social context and co-text while moving through time. Yet, what we have missed to date is a better understanding of the local grounding of these texts and here Messick's study of how outwardly cosmopolitan texts can be localised via the contingent archive is crucial.

To take his terms, we can think of the main texts of these manuscripts, the actual ḥadīths, as the 'library', that is cosmopolitan texts that can easily move across time and space. Yet, these books were turned into very local objects via the transmission notes, the equivalent of the vernacular 'archive'. When looking at the main text, a ḥadīth booklet might be 'just' a collection of ḥadīths ascribed to one specific transmitter or revolving around one specific theme. However, when we look at the transmission notes we see an entirely different picture: in these notes, scholars who are meaningful for one specific region or city dominate. These notes thus localise the cosmopolitan text and make the book rather meaningless (or at least significantly more complex to integrate) for other regions where these lines of transmission did not have the same cultural significance. In our case, the transmission notes localised these seemingly achronical and transregional texts and turned them into a group of books characteristic of Damascus, or rather of one particular quarter of Damascus and of one expression of Ḥanbali scholarly practices and to a large extent even of one family. Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's monumentalisation project, in creating entirely new composite manuscripts and endowing them, was meaningful in this context exactly because these books contained cosmopolitan texts localised via the contingent archive. At first glance, the manuscripts that he created and endowed might seem nothing more than another corpus of ḥadīth books that are not so different from any other such books produced elsewhere or at other times. Yet, they are something entirely different: they are a local monument consciously built up and, surprisingly, in part still standing in the same city after hundreds of years.

In line with this book's emphasis on life cycles and thus materiality, it has to be underlined that the localisation primarily affected the object, not the text. The text could easily be copied from the object and the resulting new book could be localised elsewhere with a different set of archival transmission notes. This emphasis on the material nature of the local stands in contrast to Messick's conceptualisation, as his localisation operates primarily on the textual level. His localisation is one of 'translating' cosmopolitan texts into a local language that took place primarily in the archive, the legal documents. In consequence, the actual cosmopolitan books as objects remained to some extent unchanged and their localisation took place to a large extent in a separate realm of the written word. The cosmopolitan jurisprudential book could thus theoretically move into a different local context as both: a text and an object. The ḥadīth booklets studied here certainly remained mobile texts, but they became largely immobile objects.

I want to conclude this book with two caveats to its main line of argument. Firstly, what we have seen emerging here is a radically local set of cultural practices. This chimes with the argument of my work on the Ashrafiya Library: that this library had a very strong Damascene flavour to its collection that contradicts the idea of innumerable Muslim scholars constantly on the move within long-distance networks of knowledge exchange.²⁸ Having now a second documentary book list for the same city that again directs us towards highly localised forms of knowledge production and circulation does indicate the importance of such local contexts. However, Damascus was part of the Mamluk realms and integrated into economic, political and scholarly networks well beyond its city walls and well beyond Mount Qāsyūn. Damascene scholars obviously travelled within and without the Mamluk realms, even if Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī did not, and scholars from other cities did come to Damascus. So, the argument from this study is not that localised cultural practices were the exclusive or even dominant spatial framework for scholarly engagements in Mamluk Damascus or elsewhere. Rather, this book reminds us again that translocal cultural practices cannot just be assumed to have existed, but that their existence has to be demonstrated in the respective historical context.

The second caveat brings us back to the after-life of the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī collection. As we have seen, its books lay largely dormant for some 400 years in the 'Umarīya Madrasa and were of limited interest for the following 100 years or more in the new Public/Zāhirīya/National al-Asad Library. Those books that have been edited from this collection were mostly single-text manuscripts (often from the field of law), but the composite manuscripts remained beyond the scope of editorial interest. However, since the late 1990s these manuscripts have experienced a renewed interest and many of their texts have been printed in a very peculiar form of new composite printed book. In 1999 the publishing house Dār al-Bashā'ir in Beirut published a hefty volume entitled Meeting of the Ten Last Nights of Ramadan in the Great Mosque in Mecca.²⁹ Here, seven texts, several of them from the Mamluk period, are edited from manuscripts that were read in a reading circle in the Mecca mosque during the end of Ramadan of that year. These texts are concluded with a final footnote stating that the printed text was collated with the manuscript in a public reading and includes the names of those who participated. This has led to an annual series of such volumes with well over 200 texts printed to date. Fascinatingly, from the first volume onwards we repeatedly see texts appearing that we also find in the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī collection.³⁰ Repeatedly, the texts are edited from the very manuscript in the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī corpus,³¹ and we also find his own texts among those read out and printed.³²

The materiality of these texts has thus undergone another radical transformation with the move from manuscript to print. The annual volumes, which include up to twenty texts, are a new stage in the life cycle of these texts. New binding decisions are being made on what texts to bring together and these texts are now placed in the vicinity of entirely new co-texts. Yet, the transmission notes on the manuscripts are retained as an appendix to the main text and a new transmission note pertaining to the reading in Mecca 'revives' the chain of transmission – strikingly similar to how Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī employed the protocol of the past to revive the chains of transmission in his age. Yet, the composite printed book is probably not the way most readers interact with these texts today. The Dār al-Bashā'ir series from the very beginning page-numbered each text individually, breaking with the modern practice of numbering the folia of the composite manuscripts consecutively. More importantly, the texts circulate now mostly as digital files, not as printed books, and these files generally only contain a single text, not the entire printed volume. With their self-contained page numbering, the texts that originated as small and stand-alone booklets some 800 years ago have in some way come full circle as small, stand-alone digital files.

The Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī fihrist: Title Identification

This chapter consists first and foremost of a title-by-title presentation of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s fihrist. Behind the list lies one task essential for making sense of any medieval book list, namely to identify what title each individual entry actually refers to. Identifying titles in medieval book lists is particularly tricky because their authors/compilers, whether of a library catalogue, an endowment list or an inventory, had the books in front of them and knew exactly which books they were dealing with. In consequence, they dispensed with detailed information and used rather a system of highly condensed information. This is a perfectly rational and efficient approach to produce convenient lists for users who could always check the original books on the shelves if need be. However, this practice evidently poses substantial problems once the books are no longer on the shelves because the library has been dissolved, as is the case of the ‘Umariya Library. What is one then to make of an entry that simply states the title Kitāb al-Lubāb (Book of Kernels, see entry 252) without giving the author’s name? Does it refer to Usāma b. Muṣṭafī’s (d. 584/1188) literary anthology Lubāb al-ādāb; to al-Qaysī’s (d. 601/1204) Lubāb al-lubāb fī bayān masā’il al-ḥisāb on arithmetic; to al-Zanātī’s (fl. before 629/1232) Lubāb al-lubāb fī ‘ilm al-khuṭūṭ wa-ashkāl al-turāb on geomancy; or to Ibn al-Athīr’s (d. 630/1233) al-Lubāb fī tahdhīb al-ansāb on onomastics? These four possibilities – chosen from a small group of authors who died within fewer than fifty years of one another – are the tip of the iceberg of possible candidates. The challenge of working with such a list is thus not to end up with heaps of unresolved entries.

The task of identification at the most basic level means to offer at least a convincing reading of the title as it is in the catalogue. This was possible for 99 per cent of the 2,917 titles and those cases where it has not been possible are highlighted in the list by ‘tentative reading’, such as entries number 181a, 212d and 242e. The next level of identification is to have proposed the author (90 per cent of all titles) and/or a thematic category into which the title falls (87 per cent). Ideally, this leads to the third level of identification, matching the title with the actual manuscript that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī had in front of him when writing his fihrist (this was possible for over 47 per cent of all titles). To lay bare how this identification proceeded, the chapter will first offer some methodological reflections (cataloguing practices, identifying titles and matching manuscripts) before moving to the actual list.

Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s Cataloguing Practice

The first step to make sense of a medieval book list is to read it ‘along the grain’, that is to understand the logic of how its author/compiler entered the books. We will have to repeatedly return to this issue in the following sections, but the main general principles of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s cataloguing practice need to be laid out here. First of all, as briefly mentioned before, the fihrist has no system to order the books: there is no thematic system (in contrast to the thirteenth-century Ashrafiya catalogue) and there is also no alphabetic system. Nor is there a system in terms of materiality as we have again in the Ashrafiya catalogue, where single-text manuscripts, manuscripts with several texts (in which case we do not know whether they were multiple-text or composite manuscripts) and incomplete manuscripts are clearly separated. In the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī fihrist, by contrast, single-text, composite and incomplete manuscripts happily intermingle. What we thus have in this case is a list of almost 600 entries with some 3,000 titles in no apparent order.

When reading the fihrist, it is apparent that it was composed with users in mind who had the actual manuscripts in front of them or who had a high degree of proficiency in the cultural world of post-canonical ḥadīth transmission as practised in the Ḥanbali-Ṣāliḥiyya world of Damascus. Most importantly, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, like other authors of medieval book lists, tended to cite only one or two keywords from the title – a complete title is the exception. If names of scribes or authors are provided, the information is often also highly condensed: a reference to a particular copyist might simply be shaykhunā (our master/teacher) – and Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī certainly had more than one teacher.¹ Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī arguably employed such abbreviated titles and names in a particularly intensive way because he was so at home in this close-knit Ḥanbali-Šāliḥīya world. This context does not only explain the way he wrote his *fihris*t, but we see also in his 'proper' scholarly works that he uses condensed references that could have only been understood by a small in-group of readers.²

The highly condensed nature of the information provided in the *fihris*t thus has nothing to do with sloppiness and we see Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī as a very conscientious and careful author/compiler. He hardly ever had to correct his list and later interlinear or marginal additions are rare. The main thing he got wrong was, probably quite irritatingly for him, right at the beginning when he forgot to put his copies of the Koran first (as any decent list should do). In consequence, the introductory paragraph on folio 1b is framed in the margins by two rather uncomely entries concerning his copies of the Koran that he added later on. Among the almost 3,000 titles there are only two further corrections (entries number 75 and 215). Other additions between the lines or in the margins almost always concern personal bits of information such as entry number 25 where he states that this is 'my copy, which I read'. There are only a few isolated instances in which Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī, in my view, got an author/compiler wrong (such as entry number 39).

The care Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī took in cataloguing is particularly evident from his impressive tenacity in recording the exact part of the work in question. This is a particularly important issue for the *fihris*t because the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī collection contained so many incomplete works where only the second, or the eighth or the sixty-eighth juz' (part) of a work was there. We see that Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī gave information that only a part of the work was there for 29 per cent of all titles. Here, he can go into substantial detail, noting for instance that only the 'second of the sixth [part]' (entry number 535e) is in his collection. If he distributed various parts of the same work over a composite manuscript, he does not draw these volumes together, but faithfully repeats the title each time for the respective volume giving its physical place within the manuscript. Despite this wealth of intricate information there are very few instances where he got a numeral wrong.³

² For instance, in his biographical dictionary al-Jawhar al-munaddad he regularly refers to 'shaykhunā Taqī al-Dīn'. He had at least two important teachers with this laqab and it is simply impossible for us to know who is meant (Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī, al-Jawhar, p. 3, n. 3).

The impression of a carefully composed list also appears when we look at its layout. Admittedly, the fibrist's title page looks messy as he added his dream narrative and turned the page three times by ninety degrees to squeeze it onto the page. And admittedly, the list itself does not easily lend itself to discussion of structure, order or mise-en-page. For instance, the lines per page can vary between twelve and nineteen giving the list, at first glance, a rather irregular appearance. In addition, his script is – as we have seen in Chapter 1 – not the most clear or legible.

However, if we move beyond the first impression and dig deeper into the actual list an altogether different picture starts to emerge. First of all, almost all entries start with either kitāb (book or single-text manuscript) or majmū' (here 'composite manuscript'), giving the list a regular structure with a relatively even margin on the right-hand side. Furthermore, he uses display script for each new entry to clearly structure the page: in the case of kitāb he elongates the final letter bā', ب, so that it simultaneously underlines the entry's first line; in the case of majmū' he elongates the medial letter mīm, م, so that the textblock (these entries can easily run over more than ten lines) is de facto indented. In the rare cases where he starts an entry with a different term, such as musawwada ('draft', for example entry number 237 on folio 17b) and Musnad (for example number 46 on folio 3a), he again puts it in display script. At the end of entries that he (partly or in full) authored himself – and there are many of them – he also elongates the final letter yā', ي, of taṣnīfī (my composition) to mark the end of the entry. Within the long series of titles in composite manuscripts he provides orientation with very distinct waws, و, though there are some moments when he forgets them.⁴ Finally, he employs narrow line spacing within each entry and generous line spacing between entries, which again aids visual orientation on the page.

⁴ For instance, in entries no. 507–10.

There is no doubt when looking at Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's cataloguing practice that his *fihris*t was a work of love and dedication. However, for a reader of the *fihris*t some 500 years later its highly condensed form still poses serious challenges. In writing down the titles, for instance, Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī followed the system of most authors/compiler of medieval book lists, namely that he tended to cite the keywords from what Arne Ambros has called the title's 'guiding phrase'.⁵ This phrase is the first part of the (generally rhyming) title and hardly ever gives an insight into what the book in question is about. Taking keywords from the title's second part, the 'thematic phrase', by contrast, is rare in the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī *fihris*t and in book lists in general. In consequence, we find quite a lot of 'flowers', 'kernels', 'gardens', 'eyes', 'mirrors' and so on, which pose some evident challenges for identifying titles and to which we will return further down. A feature that is quite peculiar to the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī *fihris*t is that it contains this high number of very brief post-canonical ḥadīth collections. These works often do not have 'proper' titles in the sense of the guiding phrase/thematic phrase scheme, but they often carry no title at all or have very generic titles starting with terms such as majlis (session), fawā'id (teachings), ḥadīth, amālī (dictations), takhrīj (compilation),⁶ and so on. When Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī entered such titles into the *fihris*t, he thus had considerable room for manoeuvre in how to render them. Entry number 4210 is one such typical collection consisting of only five folia. The manuscript that Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī had in front of him when writing the entry has the title (rather a scribbled note on the first folio) Zawāj Abī al-Āṣ b. al-Rabī' min Zaynab bint al-rasūl (The Marriage of Abī al-Āṣ b. al-Rabī' with Zaynab, the Messenger's Daughter) from which Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī could have easily quoted the terms Zawāj Abī al-Āṣ in the *fihris*t. However, he opted for quite a different title, namely the highly generic Takhrīj al-Ḥāfiẓ (Compilation of al-Ḥāfiẓ), referring to the grand twelfth-century scholar 'Abd al-Ghanī al-Maqdisī, whom we have encountered repeatedly. This choice can be explained with what mattered to Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī: it was not so much the content of the work that he was interested in (ḥadīths on one specific historical event); what he really wanted in the foreground was the social context in which this collection had been composed. That he owned a work compiled by one of those scholars he considered to be his forefathers was for Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī of much more relevance than what this work was actually about. Works without ‘proper’ titles are such a salient feature in the fihrist that we find some 750 titles with the five terms majlis, fawā’id, ḥadīth, amālī and takhrīj alone. In consequence, the fihrist has at first glance an extraordinarily generic feel to it: for entry after entry we simply get Session of X, Teachings of Y and Dictations of Z. It was often only the identification of the actual manuscript in a modern-day collection that made it possible for any sense to be made from these entries.

⁵ Ambros, Beobachtungen; further developed for the early Mamluk period by Van Den Bossche, Past, Panegyric, and the Performance.

⁶ This term could take on a very distinct technical meaning in the sense of a ḥadīth scholar evaluating the status of ḥadīths that were used in books from other fields, such as law. However, in the context of the works cited in the *fihris*t, the term has the much less narrowly defined meaning of 'compilation'.

In terms of cataloguing practices there is one group of entries that leads to considerable problems for identifying titles: Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was also generous with his room for manoeuvre when it came to adjusting titles of his own works to his needs. The reason for this is less clear-cut than it is for the way he cited post-canonical ḥadīth collections, but it is a salient feature of how he worked in compiling the fihrist. For instance, in number 123a he records one of his own books, entitled Manāqib Ṭalḥa (The Virtues of Ṭalḥa). The actual manuscript that he had in front of him when he was writing this entry (today Cairo, Dār al-Kutub, Ṭal‘at majāmi‘ 188/1) carries quite a different title, Mahḍ al-farḥa bi-faḍā’il Ṭalḥa (The Pure Delight in the Virtues of Ṭalḥa). The instability of his own titles is even clearer in entry number 66a where we find a Kitāb manāqib al-Shāfi‘ī (The Virtues of al-Shāfi‘ī), but in his Naming my Books list we find it as al-Durr al-nafīs fī manāqib Muḥammad b. Idrīs (The Precious Pearl on the Virtues of Muḥammad b. Idrīs). Yet, the autograph of this work (today in the British Library) again carries a slightly different title, namely al-Durr al-anīs fī manāqib Muḥammad ibn Idrīs (The Pleasant Pearl on the Virtues of Muḥammad b. Idrīs). The difference in terms of content between these titles is negligible, but in terms of cataloguing practices such liberal renderings of titles are crucial in order to understand the way the fihrist functions and are thus crucial for identifying titles.

Apart from titles, the second major variable in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s cataloguing practice are names, especially those of authors (given for 50 per cent of all titles) and to a much lesser extent scribes (given for 3 per cent of all titles).

I am not concerned here with a theoretical discussion of what authorship meant in this medieval world – though a book collection that consists primarily of works where the creator’s main contribution is that of compiling existing material certainly would provide an interesting case study. Rather, the main point here is to understand how a practitioner dealt with this issue when cataloguing books. As seen above, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī employed a highly abbreviated system (shaykhunā, al-Hāfiz) that presupposed intimate knowledge of his scholarly world or access to the actual manuscripts.

The first main point is that he is not terribly consistent. The same person can appear in very different guises, for instance the scholar Abū al-Ḥasan Muḥammad b. Yazīd al-Dimashqī (d. 299/911–12) can appear as ‘Abū al-Ḥasan al-Dimashqī’ (entry number 515i) and as ‘Muḥammad b. Yazīd’ (number 549o). One encounters the scholar Muḥammad b. Mukhallad al-Khaṭīb al-‘Aṭṭār (d. 331/942–3), in turn, as ‘al-‘Aṭṭār’ (number 232b), ‘Ibn Mukhallad’ (number 459c) and also as ‘al-Khaṭīb’ (number 529f). At the same time the same name can obviously refer to two very different individuals, such as ‘al-Qāḍī ‘Alā’ al-Dīn’ who can be either al-Qāḍī ‘Alā’ al-Dīn ‘Alī b. Sulaymān al-Mardāwī (d. 885/1480) (number 24) or al-Qāḍī ‘Alā’ al-Dīn ‘Alī Ibn al-Laḥḥām (d. 803/1401) (number 351). Another example is the name ‘Ibn Mulā‘ib’, which can refer either to Dāwūd b. Aḥmad Ibn Mulā‘ib (d. 616/1219) (number 432d) or Aḥmad b. Mulā‘ib al-Baghḍādī (d. 275/888–9) (number 432e). In combination with the often very generic titles, access to the actual manuscript is in many cases the only chance to sort out who is who.

The second main issue when it comes to personal names is Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s decision-making as to whom he identifies as ‘author’ of a work. As indicated above, the concept of ‘authorship’ is not very helpful for understanding to whom Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī ascribed what is more aptly called ‘scholarly ownership’. Scholarly ownership is in many ways a more helpful term as it avoids connotations of authorial originality – particularly helpful for the *fihris*t with its many post-canonical ḥadīth works. These works are ‘simply’ collections of previously existing reports on the sayings and deeds of the Prophet and they even explicitly refer to earlier collections from which they take a selection of ḥadīths. In consequence, one again has ample room for manoeuvre to decide which of the scholars involved in the transmission of these ḥadīths is to be named as ‘scholarly owner’. One example to illustrate this: Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī gives entry number 405j the title Ḥadīth al-Ḥāfiẓ (The Ḥadīth of al-Ḥāfiẓ), referring to a brief collection compiled by ‘Abd al-Ghanī whom we have just seen. ‘Abd al-Ghanī’s work goes back to the al-Fawā’id al-‘awālī by the tenth-century scholar al-Thaqaḥī, who could have very well been named as author. In addition, the subsequent transmitter of this work, al-Silafī (d. 576/1180), would have also been a reasonable candidate to be put down as its creator. Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī is not alone in facing tricky decisions when pinning names to these texts; a look at modern library catalogues shows that this is a persistent issue when dealing with such texts.⁷

Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī had his clear agenda of monumentalisation in this *fihris*t and we can thus see a pattern of whom is identified as author: he clearly prioritised scholars whom he saw as his intellectual and cultural ancestors. In other words, if he had the option, he tended to choose mostly Ḥanbalī scholars from Damascus as authors or scholarly owners – as with the Compilation of al-Ḥāfiẓ. However, the further we move from Damascus and from Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s time, the less we see a clear pattern emerging and again, one must be careful not to ascribe too much consistency to what Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī did. For instance, entries number 525e and 525f are both ḥadīth collections by the prominent scholar Ibn Shādhān (d. 426/1034) that subsequently underwent a process of selection by his younger peer al-Azajī (d. 444/1052). Where ‘authorship’ resides is obviously not a clear-cut issue and Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī here takes a rather hands-off approach, simply ascribing entry number 525e to al-Azajī and number 525f to Ibn Shādhān.

Identifying Titles

From the above cataloguing practices, it is already evident that identifying titles from a book list with highly abridged and unstable titles as well as brief and inconsistent names is far from straightforward. In the case of the *fihris*t, identifying titles poses another particular challenge on account of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s book hand. The process of identifying the titles followed three main stages that I want to briefly outline here, as it might be useful for future work on book lists.

The first stage was to pin down the obvious candidates, that is those entries with authors' names or more detailed titles. Here, the classical book list of Arabic Studies, the Fihrist of the tenth-century Baghdadi bookseller Ibn al-Nadīm, turned out to be of little help.⁸ In the same vein, modern reference and overview works such as the Encyclopaedia of Islam, Baghdādī's Īdāḥ al-maknūn, Sezgin's Geschichte des arabischen Schrifttums, al-Kaḥḥāla's Mu'jam al-Mu'allifin, Brockelmann's Geschichte der arabischen Litteratur and al-Ziriklī's al-A'lām proved to be of limited usefulness.⁹ The decisive works were rather those focused on the Ḥanbali written legacy, such as most importantly the Mu'jam muṣannafāt al-ḥanābila by 'Abd Allāh al-Ṭarīqī.¹⁰ The identification of this first cluster of entries allowed the most crucial piece of information to be established when working on a book collection: its thematic profile. Even though it was fairly likely from the outset that this would be a strongly Ḥanbali collection, mapping the extent to which it was infused with very distinct Ṣāliḥīya/Damascene elements was crucial for the next steps.

The second stage consisted of starting to match extant manuscripts with entries, that is building up the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī manuscript corpus (more on that further down). This turned out to be the decisive step as for almost 50 per cent of the entries the original manuscript that Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī had in front of him when he was writing his fihrist could be identified. In these cases, the identification is rock solid and, more importantly, it helped me to understand the way Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī abbreviated titles and the way he chose which 'authors' to name and how to name them. In consequence, numerous additional cases – where no manuscript is extant or matched (yet) – could be identified by relying on this information on Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's working method. Matching titles with the actual manuscript was of particular importance in the case of this fihrist because of its close links with the world of post-canonical ḥadīth scholarship. These collections are hardly ever cited in subsequent works, so one is initially on shaky ground when trying to nail them down. In addition, we have the above-mentioned problem of instable titles that is particularly pronounced in post-canonical ḥadīth scholarship. Here, it is often only the manuscript that can provide a better understanding of what a title is about. For instance, entry number 544g reads Takhrīj al-Dāraqūṇī (Compilation of al-Dāraqūṇī) and only after having identified the actual manuscript in its modern-day location, National al-Asad Library MS 3798/12, is it possible to understand that this title is a collection of ḥadīths compiled by Ibn Ḥayyawayh (d. 382/992).

After these two stages, the largest cluster of remaining unidentified titles was – at first glance rather counter-intuitively – Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī own works. On the one hand we hardly find any manuscripts of his works, which would obviously have been the most helpful way to identify his works. On the other hand, as we have seen in Chapter 1, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s works were almost without exception disregarded by subsequent generations of scholars. In consequence, one finds hardly any contextual information (most importantly quotes from/references to/discussion of his works) that would allow the 671 entries in the fihrist that he authored himself to be pinned down. This state of affairs has already hampered previous scholarship that worked on the fihrist. We thus find long lists of what Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī authored, consisting to a large degree of nothing but the keywords that we find in the fihrist. Using his fihrist without further contextual information is however a rather risky approach. For instance, in many cases it is entirely unclear whether two keywords refer to one title or rather to two distinct titles. We thus find in modern lists a book by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī which supposedly carries the title Zahr al-ḥadā’iq wa-marāqī al-janān (The Gardens’ Flowers and Ascent to Paradise),¹¹ even though these are two distinct works, namely Zahr al-ḥadā’iq fī mawlid khayr al-khalā’iq (The Gardens’ Flowers on the Birth of the Best of Mankind) on the Prophet’s birth (see entry number 103a in the fihrist) and his paraenetic Kitāb Marāqī al-janān (Ascent to Paradise, see entry number 103b and also number 116). Furthermore, even where a convincing reading of a title by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī could be proposed, there was no chance of getting an idea of what the book in question was about on the basis of the keyword(s) drawn from the title’s ‘guiding phrase’. In consequence, modern lists of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s works have long lists of flowery and very unhelpful keywords. Taken together with his practice of liberally changing keywords in titles, the hundreds of titles by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī were thus a major headache for making sense of the fihrist.

This changed when I came across one of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī auto-bibliographies, that is one of those lists in which he enumerates his own oeuvre and this brings us to the third stage. We have seen in Chapter 2 that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was quite enthusiastic about composing such lists, most of which have however not survived (or have not yet been identified). Nevertheless, manuscript Princeton, Garrett 273H/2 contains on folia 47 to 58 such a list, entitled Naming my Books (Tasmiya li-kutubī). This list is in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s hand and was key to unlocking the cluster of unidentified Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī titles as it has not been used in scholarship before. This alphabetically arranged list is the second draft of this auto-bibliography: folia 52 and 53 are a fragment of an earlier draft that was for some reason laid into this manuscript and here we see significantly fewer entries for each letter and a different mise-en-page (most strikingly letter headings are in red, while they are in black in the second draft). Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī had finished the second (and final?) version of the Naming my Books list before he sat down to write the fihrist. This is evident from the simple fact that the Naming my Books list was part of the fihrist (see entry number 208b) and, more importantly, from some books which he marked as ‘unfinished’ in the Naming my Books list, but that had been completed when he wrote the fihrist.¹² As the Naming my Books list was written earlier it evidently does not include all the books by him that we find in the fihrist. However, with over 500 titles he must have written this second draft at a quite advanced stage of his life and not long before the fihrist, where we find 671 titles by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī. Internal evidence allows this list to be dated with more precision: he includes in the Naming my Books list the collection of fatwās that he had issued in the years 888, 889 and 890 (c. 1483–4), but he did not list the collections of the following years (which do however appear in the fihrist, see entries number 87, 93, 99 and 105). The most likely date for this list is thus the year 891/1486–7.

The Naming my Books list with more than 500 titles offered two main benefits for identifying titles: firstly, even though it is written in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s ‘shoddy’ hand, having two slightly different shoddy versions of the same title helped stabilise the reading enormously.¹³ Furthermore, the alphabetical arrangement of this auto-bibliography left no doubt as to what the title’s first letter was meant to be, which is often far from clear from the fihrist alone. Secondly, the Naming my Books list has the full titles. As many of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s titles rhymed, as was customary, having the second part repeatedly offered the key to reading the first part.¹⁴ More importantly, the second part is the thematic phrase that helped in numerous cases to identify the content. For instance, entry number 246d in the fihrist carries the title Zahrāt al-wādī (Flower of the Valley), a typical case of beautiful, but somewhat elusive, keywords taken from the guiding phrase. We find these keywords in title lists in modern scholarship, but what this work was about has remained entirely unclear.¹⁵ The Naming my Books list shows that its full title is Zahrāt al-wādī fī tarjamat Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī (Flower of the Valley on the Biography of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī), so we know that we are dealing with a ‘biography’ of the above-mentioned Damascene Ḥanbali scholar and ancestor of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, Muḥammad b. Aḥmad Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, whose oeuvre is so well represented in the fihrist.

Furthermore, with the Naming my Books list at hand it was possible to pin down which books were actually authored by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī. The fihrist is at many points unequivocal as to Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s authorship, but there are numerous cases where things are not that straightforward. This concerns titles where he simply did not explicitly claim authorship, such as entry number 496a where his authorship only transpires from the Naming my Books list.¹⁶ Considerably more complicated are those entries of composite manuscripts where Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī simply states at the end 'most of it is my composition' (ghālibuhu taṣnīfī), giving the modern reader no clue which of the six, nine or fourteen titles are actually his own. Modern scholarship has erred on the generous side in these cases and many of the titles that appear in modern Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī bibliographies are highly debatable. For instance, entry number 168 in the fihrist is a manuscript with eight titles where Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī ends with 'most of it is my composition'. Of these, seven can definitely be ascribed to Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī on the basis of the Naming my Books list. Conversely, we can therefore say that the only remaining title (number 168d), which has also been ascribed to him, is definitely not one of his works.¹⁷

¹⁴ For instance, entry no. 233h appears as Tahrīm al-ḥālīf in modern scholarship (al-Ṭarīqī, Muṣannafāt al-ḥanābila, V, p. 66). However, in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, Tasmiya, fol. 50a, one sees the full title and taking the rhyme scheme into account this title is Tahrīm al-khālīq ikrām al-fāsiq. In the same vein a title Arba‘in asmā’ al-muhājirin li-llāh circulates in modern scholarship (al-Ṭarīqī, Muṣannafāt al-ḥanābila, V, p. 49), but in reality, entry no. 210f reads Arba‘in Asmā’ al-Mihrawāniya.

The importance of the Naming my Books list is more evident still when we turn to one of those entries in the fihrist with works by Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī where we do not find any match with the list, that is a case where we have nothing but a bare list of keywords from his guiding phrases. Entry number 178 in the fihrist is such a case, containing eleven titles that Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī claims for himself. These titles must have been written after he had finished his Naming my Books list as we do not find any one of these titles in it. In consequence, what we have further down in entries number 178a to 178k is a rather meaningless list of keywords that do not give us any idea of what these titles are actually about – without the Naming my Books list there would have been some 500 such meagre entries.

Matching the Manuscripts

Matching an entry in a medieval book list with an extant manuscript is generally a fiendish affair and thus deserves a methodological section in its own right. In my discussion of the thirteenth-century Ashrafiya Library I employed a confidence scale from 1 to 3 to indicate how secure an ascription was.¹⁸ In the analysis of the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī collection, however, I dispensed with such a scale as it quickly became clear that matching his entries and manuscripts was a surprisingly exact science. This goes back to three main reasons. Firstly, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī was an outstandingly enthusiastic writer of manuscript notes because, as we saw in Chapter 3, these notes were an integral part of his monumentalisation project. In consequence, even for texts that exist in numerous copies around the world, an Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī manuscript note (written in his characteristic hand) leaves no doubt as to which of these manuscripts once sat on his shelves.¹⁹ Secondly, matching entry and manuscript is in the case of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection a particularly straightforward affair because of the high number of composite manuscripts. Each of these manuscripts is a highly idiosyncratic combination of previously independent codicological units and each of them is in this combination and in this sequence a unicum. For these composite manuscripts with their unmistakable fingerprint, matching entry and manuscript would be at the upper end of any confidence scale even if manuscript notes had been absent. Thirdly, a large number of manuscripts from the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection stayed in Damascus and, as we have seen, their transfer from the ‘Umariya Madrasa to what is today the National al-Asad Library is well documented. In consequence, we know for certain which manuscripts have a ‘Umariya Madrasa provenance and are thus strong candidates for once having belonged to the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection. For these reasons, matching entry with manuscript in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection has not only been much more secure than in the case of the Ashrafiya, but has also yielded a much higher number of matches.

¹⁶ Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī, Tasmiya, fol. 54b: Shurfat al-'ālim fī kalām Abī al-Qāsim.

¹⁸ Hirschler, Medieval Damascus, pp. 46–7.

Matching entries in a medieval book list with extant manuscripts is at first nothing but a poorly informed stab in the dark. The obvious point to start the search was the National al-Asad Library and indeed a large number (in the final count almost 90 per cent of the matched titles) did turn up there. After initial and meandering searches (the Fihrist maktabat al-makhṭūṭāt of Kuwait University was an important starting point),²⁰ the three printed catalogues of composite and multiple-text manuscripts in Damascus by Yāsīn al-Sawwās were incredibly helpful.²¹ After having matched a considerable number of manuscripts, it turned out that the current classmarks in the National al-Asad Library still bear deep traces of medieval book collections. This might come as a surprise as these classmarks were only assigned in the 1980s when the Zāhirīya Library collection was transferred into the National al-Asad Library. The Zāhirīya classmarks (which also do not go back further than the late nineteenth century when the Ottoman Public Library was founded) at least included thematic markers, where the National al-Asad Library uses plain classmarks with numbers simply starting at 1 and currently running to just over 19,000. However, these classmarks turned out to be much less plain than they appeared at first glance. Most importantly, it turned out that there were two very distinctive Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī clusters between classmarks 3700 and 3900 as well as between 4500 and 4600 – 83 per cent (or over 1,000) of all titles matched with manuscripts from Damascus fall into these two ranges.

¹⁹ There might be a few isolated cases where he acquired an additional copy of a text after he had written the fihrist and the manuscript is thus (erroneously) matched with the entry. However, as most manuscript notes are dated, such cases, if they exist at all, must be very few.

This is obviously not a coincidence, but goes back to the trajectory of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection that we discussed in the previous chapters. When the ‘Umarīya manuscripts were absorbed into the new Ottoman Public Library, the historic collections were ripped apart and distributed across thematic categories together with manuscripts from other former Damascene libraries. However, the majmū’s did not really fit any thematic category and were thus put into their own category. As it turned out, virtually all of the majmū’s that made their way into the new Public Library came from the ‘Umarīya and they were neatly numbered majmū’ 1, majmū’ 2, and so on.²² When the Ottoman Public Library became the Zāhirīya Library, these classmarks were retained. When they were moved in the 1980s into the National Library, however, all manuscripts were assigned new classmarks. Yet the staff systematically worked their way through the old system, so the plain classmarks retain traces of the historical collection. When they arrived at the 3700er classmarks they had reached the majmū’s, which were put into the system one after the other, so we have today a cluster of manuscripts that goes back to the endowment made by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī some 500 years earlier.

The story of classmark range 4500 to 4600 is at first glance less straightforward. These manuscripts were already part of the Zāhirīya Library as is evident from library stamps on them. Yet they are not documented in the 1882-catalogue of the Zāhirīya’s predecessor, the Ottoman Public Library, so their provenance is more difficult to establish. What is striking about the ‘books’ in this classmark range is that almost without exception these titles are fairly small booklets, generally unbound, made up of as few as three bifolia²³ or even only two bifolia.²⁴ For our purposes, the really interesting aspect is that so many of them had previously belonged to one of the composite manuscripts from the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection. For instance, manuscripts 4510 and 4513 are two ḥadīth collections that once belonged to the same composite manuscript that we find in the fihrist under entry number 539 (they were numbers 539m and 539n respectively). Composite manuscript number 539 is today MS3754 in the National al-Asad Library, where we find thirteen of the fifteen titles that Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī listed in his fihrist – and the two missing booklets are 4510 and 4513. In other cases, we just find loose pages in this classmark range. For instance, the fourth item in composite manuscript 462, National al-Asad Library, number 3761/4, is missing folia and we find five of these folia in classmark 4504 as an independent codicological unit. In this classmark range are thus booklets and folia from composite manuscripts that have become detached from their ‘original’ binding at some point after Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī recorded them in his fihrist.²⁵

The story of these items brings us back to the 1878 dissolution of the ‘Umarīya Library. As we have seen, the officials found on its shelves numerous unbound quires and loose folia. These were mostly fragments that had become detached from their books and, rather than rebinding them, the

'Umarīya librarians retained them somewhere on the side in the library's 'messy section' (the Ashrafiya catalogue from the thirteenth century bears witness to that library having a messy section where all the incomplete manuscripts were stored).²⁶ When the 'Umarīya manuscripts were moved to the Ottoman Public Library they were not included in the catalogue, probably because priorities lay elsewhere. In the Ottoman Public Library and its successor, the Zāhirīya Library, they retained their identity as 'problem items' and were not included in the standard classmark system. The director of the Zāhirīya Library, Youssef Eche (Yūsuf al-'Īsh), wrote on this 'messy' section in 1943: 'When the Zāhirīya Library was founded [i.e. the Public Library], scattered papers [awrāq] and quires [karārīs] came to the library in bundles. They were kept to be classified at a later point and we started to retrieve books from them.'²⁷ Notes on manuscripts show that the librarians in the Zāhirīya assigned numbers to these bundles (dashḥ) in this process.²⁸

Youssef Eche stated that in this process of classifying papers and quires, books were 'retrieved'. The manuscript evidence shows that the librarians' intervention was in fact more far-reaching and included the creation of entirely new composite manuscripts. When the catalogue of the newly founded Public Library was published in 1882, the number of such composite manuscripts was 131.²⁹ Yet, when the Catalogue of the 'Umarīya composite manuscripts (a misnomer as not all of them went back to the 'Umarīya) was published in 1987 the number had risen to 152.³⁰ And indeed, we find all those composite manuscripts from Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī's fihrisṭ that are extant in Damascus in the first group of 131 composite manuscripts (currently classmarks 3738 to 3868) in the National al-Asad Library. If we find material from the Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī fihrisṭ in the second group (132 to 152), these are newly created manuscripts that contain booklets drawn from various Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī manuscripts that must have disintegrated in the meantime. The composite manuscript 139 (currently classmark 3878), for instance, contains booklets from the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī composite manuscripts entries 346, 373 and 466 as well as the previously single-text manuscripts entries 98 and 166. A modern note on the first folio explicitly mentions that this first booklet came from such a bundle of loose papers and quires. We thus find fragments of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī composite manuscripts in the classmark range 4500 to 4600 as individual items and in the classmark range 3868 and 3886 as newly created modern composite manuscripts.

For practical purposes, the main point is that when the new classmarks were assigned in the 1980s in the National al-Asad Library the composite manuscripts and the fragments retained their respective group identity once the cataloguers started to work on them and they thus all ended up in distinctive classmark ranges – again a wonderful example of a ‘plain’ classmark system carrying heavy historical luggage. Identifying distinct Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī/‘Umarīya Library/Ottoman Public Library/Zāhiriya Library/National al-Asad Library classmark ranges thus enabled me to systematically check all manuscripts within these ranges. This in turn led to a large number of matches that would not have been evident from the National al-Asad Library catalogues.

While it was possible to peruse the holdings of the National al-Asad Library in Damascus in a relatively systematic fashion via digitised manuscripts, this was evidently impossible to do for all other major libraries with Arabic manuscripts. This is in part because of the highly uneven quality of cataloguing across the different institutions and because we are far from having anything near to union catalogues for Arabic manuscripts. Much more importantly, it was the large number of composite manuscripts that posed a particular challenge, as such items are generally the last to be catalogued and, if they are catalogued, they are often described in a very succinct way. To give but one example: entry number 472 in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection is a composite manuscript with twelve distinct titles mostly, but not exclusively, on biographies of prominent women composed by the Damascene scholar al-Qāsim b. ‘Alī Ibn ‘Asākir (d. 600/1203). Today this work is in the Chester Beatty Library in Dublin with classmark Ar 3016, but its identity is not obvious at all from the Chester Beatty catalogue which states: ‘(Biographies of famous women), by ‘Alī [...] al-Mu‘āfirī

(The author's rough draft of an untitled work) [...] Autograph.³¹ In this catalogue description, the multiple-text nature of the manuscript with each individual work having its own title is not evident, rather it sounds like a biographical dictionary of women, and the scribe al-Mu'āfirī is mistaken for the author. It is thus impossible to identify the connection between the Chester Beatty manuscript Ar 3016 and entry number 472 from the catalogue alone.

A further problem specific to this fihrist for matching entry and extant manuscript is the large number of post-canonical ḥadīth collections that do not carry 'proper' titles as shown above. These titles can appear in modern catalogues under quite different guises. For instance, we have seen above entry number 405j, Ḥadīth al-Ḥāfiẓ (The Ḥadīth of al-Ḥāfiẓ). This booklet is today in Princeton with classmark Garrett 1851y and the catalogue has it with the title al-Thaqafī's al-Fawā'id al-'awālī; riwāyah of al-Silafī, takhrīj of 'Abd al-Ghanī ibn 'Abd al-Wāḥid ibn 'Alī ibn Surūr al-Maqdisī. Both options are perfectly reasonable, but Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī prioritised the 'authorship' of his Damascene forefather 'Abd al-Ghanī al-Maqdisī, and gave this manuscript (which has no title) the generic term 'ḥadīth' whereas the modern Princeton cataloguer chose the generic term 'fawā'id' and prioritised the authorship of al-Thaqafī.

Matching such entries (with highly unstable titles and author names) with manuscripts was only possible once I identified those libraries that had received larger groups of Damascene books from late nineteenth and early-twentieth-century manuscript dealers. This modern part of the collection's story was also discussed in Chapter 4 and we have seen that libraries such as Princeton, Dublin and Berlin emerged as locations for matched entries outside the Middle East (see Map 4.1 for trajectories of manuscripts). In consequence, I checked these libraries' holdings in more detail and only then was I able to identify matches such as Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī fihrist number 472–Chester Beatty Ar 3016 and Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī fihrist number 405j–Princeton Garrett 1851y. The only library for which systematic work had previously been carried out on manuscripts of Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī own works (though not for manuscripts by other authors that he owned) is the Dār

al-Kutub in Cairo where the excellent work by Ibn ‘Abd al-Khāliq was very helpful.³²

To establish that a manuscript actually is the exact manuscript that once sat on the shelves of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s library I erred on the side of caution and used two principal criteria. The first criterion is that the manuscript carries manuscript notes involving Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī himself. As we saw in Chapter 3 there is an almost complete absence of ownership notes by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī and a complete absence of any notes referring to his endowment, so the most obvious smoking guns were not available. However, as argued in that chapter, Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī employed transmission notes as stand-ins for ownership notes.

The second criterion is an exact match in terms of titles between a composite manuscript as recorded by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī in his fihrist and a composite manuscript as we find it today in a modern library. To illustrate this by way of example, entry number 541 in the fihrist consists of twenty-three distinct titles, for the most part post-canonical collections of ḥadīths. In the National al-Asad Library we find under classmark 3777 a composite manuscript with exactly these titles in exactly the same order. The chance that a second composite manuscript was ever bound together with these titles – for most of which we do not find another manuscript anywhere else in the world – in exactly this order is close to zero. In addition, the individual texts are full of scholarly transmission notes and endowment notes (seven of them carry endowments referring to the Ḍiyā’iyya Madrasa/ Dār al-Ḥadīth), showing that these booklets had circulated in Damascus and especially in the Ṣāliḥiyya Quarter during the heyday of post-canonical ḥadīth transmission. For instance, the text that is in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s fihrist number 541u (and that is today classmark 3777/20) carries thirteen transmission notes that start out in the centre of Damascus (those on folio 308a), but then move up to Ṣāliḥiyya (from folio 308b onwards) where we see the usual topographical suspects, especially the quarter’s Muẓaffarī Mosque, as places where this manuscript was read. That two of the texts in this composite manuscript (541d and 541n) carry scholarly notes in the hand of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī himself only confirms what has already become evident; that manuscript National al-Asad Library 3777 was once part of the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī collection.

In addition to these two principal criteria that cover over 90 per cent of the manuscript matches, a small number of manuscripts has been matched on the basis of contextual information. These are always a combination of several indicators such as classmark range, a mention in the 1882-catalogue as a ‘Umarīya-manuscript, and production or circulation in the cultural world of Ṣāliḥīya Ḥanbalism. For instance, entry number 415, a commentary on Ḥanbali fiqh, is most likely manuscript Princeton, Garrett 537y. Here, the place of copying, the ‘Umarīya Madrasa, and the identity of the copyist, a close colleague of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, are the main indicators.

The importance of the steps laid out here in order to read the fihrist of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī becomes evident when we turn to the only other edition of this list. Its editor did an incredibly good job of reading Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s difficult script.³³ However, even the most able editor hits the wall when reading this list without having recourse to the corpus of the actual manuscripts. In numerous cases, it is simply impossible to offer even an informed guess as to what the scribble at the end of a line means without such external evidence. In consequence, titles and authors are repeatedly not identified at all or erroneously in this edition.³⁴ Similarly, not having had access to the Naming my Books list led to numerous problems in reading the titles of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī himself.³⁵

To conclude, a final note on the match between the order of booklets as we find them in the fihrist and as we find them today in the actual manuscript(s): in many cases we do indeed see that we have a perfect match between the fihrist and the present-day manuscript.³⁶ In other cases, as we have seen, one or some booklets are missing (most likely because they became loose), but the remainder of the composite manuscript still matches the order of booklets as we see it in the fihrist to a large extent. Such missing items are often, as might be expected, the first or last booklet(s), which were most susceptible to becoming detached from the binding.³⁷ A further typical case of differences between fihrist and actual manuscript is that we find fragmentary items in the manuscript that are not listed in the fihrist, most likely because Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī did not bother to catalogue these items.³⁸ In all these cases the differences can be easily detected and do not fundamentally change the fact that we have a match between an entry in the fihrist and an extant manuscript.

Significantly trickier are those cases where we see substantial rebinding going on and these can in my view be explained by two entirely separate phenomena. The first, and numerically far more important, is an entry for which we find all (or most) booklets in manuscripts that are still in Damascus today. One example of this is entry number 445 which was entirely dismantled, so we find what used to be the first booklet (445a) in a composite manuscript of two booklets (National al-Asad Library 1231); what used to be the second booklet in another composite manuscript of two booklets (National al-Asad Library 3428); what used to be the fifth item in a large composite manuscript (National al-Asad Library 3249) that has absorbed many booklets from other composite manuscripts mentioned in the fihrist; what used to be the seventh item in another such large composite manuscript (National al-Asad Library 3802) and so on. There are no textual traces of when and where such rebinding occurred, but the most likely scenario is that a librarian in the 'Umarīya Library took booklets that had become loose and rebound them to save them from dispersal and loss. This scenario would again indicate that there was more to the story of the 'Umarīya Library during the Ottoman period than theft and decline.

³⁷ For instance, MS Chester Beatty Ar 3016 (cf. no. 472) where the last booklet is missing; MS Damascus, National al-Asad Library 3755 (cf. no. 530) where the first two booklets are missing; ibid. 3833 (cf. no. 535) where the first two booklets are missing again; ibid. 3775 (cf. no. 470o) where what used to be the first booklet is now the last item in the same composite manuscript.

³⁸ For instance, MS Damascus, National al-Asad Library 3796 (cf. no. 461) where the third item in the manuscript, a two-folia fragment of the Riyādat al-abdān by Abū Nu‘aym, is not listed in the fihrist; ibid. 954 (cf. no. 501) where the fourth item in the manuscript, a four-folia fragment of the Muntakhab min kitab Tadhkirat al-Khallāl, is not listed in the fihrist; Paris, Bibliothèque Nationale, suppl. turc 986 (cf. no. 568) where the eighth item in the manuscript, a two-folia fragment of poetry, is not listed in the fihrist.

The second such phenomenon is where booklets that were once in one composite manuscript, as we see from the *fihris*t, are now distributed over one or several new manuscripts that are in libraries outside Damascus. For instance, entry number 405 used to be a composite manuscript of sixteen booklets. Five booklets, 405d, e, f, m and n, are missing (or rather I have not found them), eight items are in Dublin in the Chester Beatty Library, and two items are in Princeton. Interestingly, the eight booklets in Dublin were rebound into two new composite manuscripts (405a, b and c became Chester Beatty Ar 3849; and 405g, h, i, k, o became Chester Beatty Ar 3524). The two Princeton items (405j is Princeton, Garrett 1851y; and 405l is Princeton, Garrett 1852y), by contrast, are independent booklets. What has happened here appears to be commercial 'rebinding' where manuscript dealers in late nineteenth and early-twentieth-century manuscripts systematically cut composite manuscripts apart to increase their margins by selling one for the price of three. Torsten Wollina has recently identified similar practices for the sale of the autographs by Ibn Ṭūlūn.³⁹ Splitting up composite manuscripts could have happened at many other points in their life cycles and Jan Schmidt has shown the role of the Leiden librarian M. Th. Houtsma in one such case.⁴⁰

To give these intricate and fascinating stories of rebinding the space they deserve would require at least another chapter. It suffices here to draw attention again to the rich material that will be gained from listening to individual manuscripts and sorting out their highly intricate trajectories – in this case material on Ottoman-period preservation techniques and manuscript trade. For our purposes here, the main point is that in these cases observing the individual trajectory in combination with the dense manuscript notes by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī again allows fihrist entries to be matched with extant manuscripts irrespective of whether they have been rebound or whether they returned to their stand-alone shape.

Title Identification

In the entry-by-entry list that follows, the standard structure of entries is thus: consecutive entry number in bold (assigned for the purpose of this book; with letter in case of composite manuscripts); folio/line in the fihrist; Arabic transcription of title as given in the fihrist; author (if part of the name is given in the fihrist, this is underlined); source; scribe if given in the fihrist; number of volumes and parts if given in the fihrist; further information if given in the fihrist; present-day manuscript location (with information on relevant manuscript notes in the following order: endowment notes, ownership notes, transmission notes); ‘rebinding’ if this is the case; ‘Ottoman Public Library’ if mentioned in the 1882-Sublime Register (Sijill jalil); and external thematic category.

The reference given under ‘source’ is in no way meant to be an exhaustive bibliography of what has been published on a specific title. Rather the aim is to provide the reader with a definitive reference for each individual title’s identification. In many cases this reference is a modern edition (of which many are merely ‘commercial’ editions), in others this might be the most pertinent reference in a contemporaneous source or in modern scholarship. The term ‘rebinding’ refers to the fact that a composite manuscript as we find it in the Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī fihrist was physically changed at some point with regard to the works it included, that is one or several works have been taken out or added. ‘Rebinding’ also includes cases where booklets probably just became loose without active ‘rebinding’. However, the changing shapes of these composite manuscripts would require its own research project to move beyond the catch-all term ‘rebinding’ as employed here. The term ‘Ottoman Public Library’ means that the manuscript is mentioned in the 1882-catalogue. The following phrase (for instance Ottoman Public Library: ḥadīth 422) is the classmark given to that manuscript in the 1882-catalogue.⁴¹

⁴¹ These classmarks were retained when the library started to be called ‘Zāhirīya’ and were only replaced with the current consecutive system when the manuscripts moved to the National al-Asad Library.

The term ‘Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī-samā’ refers to a manuscript note documenting a reading session presided over by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī in which he grants the right to further transmit this text in future; the term ‘samā’ for Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’, by contrast, refers to a manuscript note documenting a reading session in which Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī participates in order to acquire the right to further transmit this text in future. In the latter case the name of the presiding authority (musmi’) is given in brackets. In the former case those receiving the right are listed in full or in summary fashion. Their age is given if mentioned in the manuscript note. In dates, days and months are only given according to the hijrī calendar, years are given in both hijrī and CE systems. The term samā’ is used here as an overarching category independent of whether the note is actually introduced with the verb sami’a or the verb qara’a. The term ‘IAH akhbaranā-note’ (or akhbaranī-note) refers to the presence of such notes by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī with the authority (if given) in following brackets. The term ‘IAH note’ refers to all other kinds of note Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī left on the manuscripts, such as claims to an ijāza, comments on the content, statements that the manuscript is an autograph and so on.

The Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī fihrist

[fol. 1a]

List of the books [that] its writer Yūsuf Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī endowed, Praise be to God

I had a dream vision (ra’aytu fī al-naʿwm) on Wednesday night, 13 Ramaḍān 896 [1491]: I was in a place in which we wanted to pray on the occasion of a recitation of the entire Koran (fī khatma) [or ‘in a tent’ (fī khayma)] behind an esteemed man who was our imām. After he had prayed with us one rak‘a, a youngster came to him and brought him something edible. He [the imām] ate and then told him ‘Eat!’ Thereupon I said ‘A prayer led by someone who is talking during the prayer is not valid.’ I thus took my sandals and sought another place. Yet, on every single path I took I encountered one or two rivers and each time I came to a place there were three [rivers]. I went down one of these paths and found an enormous sea. There was a path through it, narrow and covered. At one point I stumbled so that it [the sea] almost swept me in and I only escaped after [considerable] effort. Subsequently, I left it [the path] to take another one. [Yet as before], each time I took a path I [again] came across one or two rivers. I grew weary of this, but I [came?]⁴² to a crossroad in the end. I sought a companion for it and two or three did indeed accompany me. After they had left me, I came to it [the crossroad] where I faced two paths. I took the right path and at once it led me to an entrance with two doors, one to the right ascending upwards and one to the left descending downwards. It occurred to me that the door to the right was the gate of Paradise and the descending on the left the gate of Hell. A dark, one-eyed man came out of it [the left door], stepped towards me and said 'Come, enter here! Nowhere will one enter Paradise with more ease than from here.' I replied 'You address such words to somebody like me and [...]?' Who are you to utter such weighty words (al-kalām al-kabīr)?' He answered 'You shall not say to me "Who are you?"' I said '[...] entered Paradise.' I stood at the gate and there were mountains and many tents. I did not pass the gate and said [to myself] 'One does not enter Paradise unless one dies.' And I thus woke up.

[fol. 1b]

In the name of God, the merciful, the compassionate; on him I rely. Praise be to God, who is the Master of the Worlds. May God bless and grant peace to our lord Muḥammad and his family and his companions.

List of the books [that] its writer endowed for himself, subsequently for his children, subsequently for their children, subsequently for his offspring and descendants and subsequently for whoever benefits from them from among the Ḥanbalis.

Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, Cairo: Dār Ḥarra’, 1997; IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 51b; FI: mujallada qat‘ kabīr; MS: D 7770, written 15.8.894/1489; MS D 7770 is a very unusual piece for IAH’s manuscripts as it was produced by a professional scribe with a sophisticated mise-en-page to graphically present the Prophet’s genealogy. This is also the only manuscript that IAH describes in this fihrist to be of ‘large size’. This work was clearly IAH’s posthumous ‘best-seller’ (cf. also IAH, Thimār al-maqāsid, editor’s introduction, p. 36), of which we find numerous manuscripts, generally with the title al-Durra al-muḍīya wa-al-‘arūsa al-marḍīya wa-al-shajara al-nabawīya wa-al-akhlāq al-Muḥammadīya. Examples of such manuscripts ascribed to IAH, often with gilded pages, are MS D7543 (written in 1143/1730; cf. also al-‘Īsh, Fihrist makhṭū‘āt al-tārīkh, I, p. 78), MS Istanbul, Süleymaniye Library: Bağdatlı Vehbi 1088, Ayasofya 1450 & 3193/2, Hamidiye 944, Kılıc Ali Paşa 741, Laleli 2060 & 2061 & 2063/1, Nuruosmaniye 837 & 3294/1; C: Prophet Muḥammad – genealogy.

and rebound into the new CM D 2943 with another theological work by the same author (cf. no. 19). This rebinding must have happened at some point between the year 897/1492, when IAH wrote this fihrist, and 948/1541, when al-Najdī, who endowed the new CM into the ‘Umarīya Madrasa, died. The present title has severe fire damage while no. 19 shows no such damage. Ottoman Public Library: ‘ilm al-tawḥīd wa-al-kalām 34 (‘Umarīya provenance); C: theology.

25 2b/1 K. al-Muqni'; this is a work by A: Muwaffaq al-Dīn Ibn Qudāma al-Maqdisī (d. 620/1223) as the same work appears below in no. 162 where the catalogue states that it is 'another copy'. The MS for that entry has been identified and the authorship of Muwaffaq al-Dīn is thus evident. FI: 'alayhā zawā'id al-Muḥarrar wa-hiya nuskhātī allatī qara' tu fihā [last three words are interlinear], al-Muḥarrar most likely refers to Ibn Taymīya's al-Muḥarrar fī al-fiqh (cf. no. 88). C: fiqh – ḥanbalī.

26 2b/2 K. al-Sarḥa, sharḥ al-mulḥa; A: Aḥmad b. Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī (d. 895/1490), IAH's brother (taṣnīf akhī); S: al-Ṭarīqī, Muṣannafāt al-ḥanābila, V, p. 20; the title of this work is not identifiable and the reading of 'sarḥa' is tentative. This commentary is most likely – similar to the following entry – on the grammatical work Mulḥat al-i'rāb by al-Qāsim b. 'Alī al-Ḥarīrī al-Baṣrī (d. 516/1122, ed. B. Y. Habbūd, Sidon 1997); C: grammar. (cf. no. 357e)

27 2b/3 K. Sharḥ al-mulḥa; A: Muḥammad b. Aḥmad Ibn al-Sa'īd al-Ḥanbalī (d. 855/1451); S: mentioned in al-Ḥarīrī, Sharḥ mulḥat al-i'rāb, ed. F. Fāris, Irbid: Dār al-Amal, p. 27 [editor's introduction]; C: grammar.

Ismā'īl, Beirut: DKI, 2004; The author's identity is very likely as IAH praised this book at length in his entry on Ibn al-Laḥḥām in his biographical dictionary al-Jawhar, p. 83. C: fiqh – ḥanbalī.

103a 5b/2 Majmū' fihī Zahr al-ḥadā'iq; A: IAH taṣnīfī; al-Ṭarīqī, Muṣannafāt al-ḥanābila, V, p. 85 has it as 'Zahr al-ḥadā'iq wa-marāqī al-janān', but IAH clearly refers to Zahr al-ḥadā'iq and Marāqī al-janān as two distinct titles here as he calls the manuscript a 'majmū''. In addition, we find this title in IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 52b as an independent title, namely Zahr al-ḥadā'iq fī mawlid khayr al-khalā'iq. C: biography of the Prophet (sīra).

103b 5b/2 wa-Marāqī al-janān; A: IAH taṣnīfī; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 57a; MS: Escorial 770; undated; H. Derenbourg, Les Manuscrits Arabes de l'Escurial, Paris 1903, II/1, p. 58 describes this as an autograph in IAH's hand on the basis of the title page, where IAH describes himself as 'kātib ḥādhabī al-aḥruf'. However, apart from the title page, this is clearly not his autograph, as its scribe wrote in a very legible naskh script with a regular layout (even margins, regular lines per page, neat rubrication (i.e. keywords) in red throughout, shaped colophon), which is never the case in an IAH-autograph. That this is not an autograph is further corroborated by a final collation note on fol. 110a in IAH's hand certifying that 'He [the copyist] reached [the end of this text] reading it back to its author ... Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī' (balagha muqābalat^{an} bi-muṣannifihī Yūsuf b. Ḥasan b. 'Abd al-Hādī al-Maqdisī al-Ḥanbalī). Escorial 770 matches rather this entry and not the second copy of this work (cf. no. 116), which IAH explicitly describes, very unusually, as an autograph, probably to clearly differentiate it from this 103b/Escorial 770 copy. M. Dols, The Black Death in the Middle East, 1977, p. 320, n.1 erroneously refers to manuscript Berlin, Ahlwardt no. 6380, which is 'reportedly lost'. However, no. 6380 in the Ahlwardt catalogue is merely one of those entries in the catalogue where Ahlwardt – aiming to write not only a catalogue, but a proper Literaturgeschichte – listed at the end of a thematic section further titles that he was aware of. A Berlin manuscript has never existed.⁵¹ C: medicine.

This title is identical to the title in entry 127 except for the first term (Zubda instead of Jāmi'). The editor of entry no. 127 is not aware of this similarity and assumes that they are two distinct titles. However, as we do not find no. 127 in the Tasmiya-list, it is very likely that the Jāmi' was the first version of the text that IAH later reworked with a slightly different title. It can thus be assumed that this entry is also C: Sufism.

169c 9a/14–16 wa-al-Faraj ba'da al-shidda; There are numerous works with this title, but it is rather unlikely that this CM contained one of the large classical works such as al-Faraj ba'da al-shidda by al-Tanūkhī (d. 447/1055–6, ed. 'A. al-Shālījī, Beirut: Dār Ṣādir, 1978). It seems much more likely that this is a work by IAH who authored 'most' of the titles in this CM, but no further evidence exists for this.

169d 9a/14–16 wa-Jawharat al-zamān; A: IAH; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 50b: 'Jawharat al-'aṣr wa-al-zamān fī manāqib al-Sultān Muḥammad b. 'Uthmān'; This is one of the few panegyrics IAH wrote for rulers, here most likely for the Ottoman Sultan Mehmed II (r. 848/1444–886/1481 with interruption). Mehmed's father was Murād and the 'b. 'Uthmān' stands here for the dynasty. It is noteworthy that IAH did not compose a panegyric for a Mamluk sultan (cf. discussion of this in Chapter 2). We find a second panegyric by IAH for an Ottoman ruler in no. 174e and (probably) for an Aqqoyunlu ruler in 219g. C: panegyric.

169e 9a/14–16 wa-Jawāhir al-lughāt; A: IAH; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 50b: 'Jawāhir al-lughāt fī sharḥ al-sab' al-mu'allaqāt'; FI: wa-ghayr dhālika ghālibuhu taṣnīfī; C: poetry – anthology – pre-Islamic – commentary.

There is one other instance where he refers to one of his teachers simply with shaykhunā and this is Abū Bakr b. Ibrāhīm Ibn Qundus (d. 861/1457, cf. no. 97). As Ibn Qundus appears as copyist in other manuscripts of this *fihris*t (cf. nos. 246e & 364c), it is highly likely that this reference is to him. C: ḥadīth – study of.

172e 9b/3–6 wa-al-Shāfi'; A: Muwaffaq al-Dīn Ibn Qudāma al-Maqdisī (d. 620/1223); S: al-Ṭarīqī, Muṣannafāt al-ḥanābila, III, p. 77; FI: qit' a min; The authorship of Ibn Qudāma is possible on account of the overall profile of IAH's collection and especially because IAH refers to this takhrīj-work

184a 10b/10–12 wa-Majmū' fīhi al-Takhrīj al-ṣaghīr; A: IAH taṣnīfī; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 50a; MS: D 1032 (al-Takhrīj al-ṣaghīr wa-al-taḥbīr al-kabīr), written in ?5.883/1478; autograph; fol. 1a ON Muḥammad b. Ṭulūn from 'Abd al-Hādī for 30 Dirhams; fol. 1a IAH note (ijāza for his children); This CM of six titles was clearly split into single-text manuscripts at some stage and the title page of D 1032 (formerly the first title page in the CM) still carries a list of the titles which had once belonged to this CM. This separation must have occurred in stages as the items 184c, d & e all have the same fire damage on the front edge, while this is not the case for 184a (I was not able to check this for MS D 3257/2 [=184f]). They must have been split up before the late 19th century, as 184f was the only item, as part of a new CM, that entered the Ottoman Public Library directly from the 'Umariya Madrasa. 184d & 184e probably also came from the 'Umariya, but as unbound fragments and we find them today in the classmark range for the former ‘messy’ section. 184b most likely went onto the market and belonged to the loose folia that Ḥabīb Zayyāt purchased in Damascus. C: ḥadīth – study of.

185e 10b/13–15 wa-'Ayn al-iṣāba; A: IAH; FI: ghālibuhu taṣnīfi; IAH states that most of the works in this CM ('ghālibuhu') are by himself. 185a & b are definitely by him and 185c & d are most likely not by him. In consequence, this fifth title is probably one of his works, but there is no additional evidence for this.

186a 11a/1–4 Majmū' fihī al-Akhhbār wa-al-'iṣāba al-āthima; A: IAH taṣnīfi; not identified.

186g 11a/1–4 wa-al-Taḥdhīr; A: IAH taṣnīfi; In his Tasmiya, fol. 50a IAH lists four titles starting with this keyword (lines 3, 8, 13, 16–17). The title in line 8 matches no. 233b and the title in line 13 matches no. 235c, so it is rather unlikely that these two match here. However, it cannot be argued with any certainty which of the two remaining titles (lines 3 [al-Taḥdhīr min lubs al-taḥrīr]) and 16–7 [al-Taḥdhīr man radda shay' min aḥādīth]) is meant here and the same applies to nos. 188b and 226n, where we also find works by IAH referred to with this keyword alone.

188g 11a/7–9 wa-al-Tabyīn; A: IAH taṣnīfī; The keyword tabyīn appears in two titles in IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 50a, but this CM was clearly produced after the Tasmiya-list was written as we find very few matches between the list and the items in no. 188. It is thus more likely that we are dealing with a title not in the Tasmiya-list and in this case, the strongest contender is MS: D 3216/12, fols 158–67 [FM/2, pp. 241–8, ‘al-Dabṭ wa-al-tabyīn li-dhawī al-‘ilal wa-al-‘āhāt min al-muḥaddithīn’], undated; autograph; rebinding; on this work see Richardson, Difference and Disability, 100–3; C: ḥadīth – collection. The other three titles in Garrett 3b are clearly different from the material in this *fihris*t: 3b/1 (fols 1–120) was written on glazed paper and probably in the 20th century, whereas 3b/4 and 3b/5 were both written in Mecca. 189i and 189j – both carrying IAH-samā' of the same day – have retained their order in the new CM. 191e 11b/1–4 *wa-Fawā‘id al-rifāq*⁶³; probably A: IAH; This work is not identified, but IAH’s authorship is likely: He states that most of the titles in this CM are by him and he has two other titles with the keyword ‘al-Rifāq’ to which this title could refer (cf. no. 184b ‘Nuzhat al-rifāq’ & 187d ‘Hadīyat al-rifāq’).

191f 11b/1–4 wa-al-Taghrīd; A: IAH; referring to one of his panegyrics; C: panegyric. (cf. no. 174e for identification and 475b, 475g)

taṣnīfī; Manuscripts of this work (cf. nos. 174a and 217e) have a slight variation in the title ('fā'iq' instead of 'lā'iq'), but I assume that this is the same work. Considering the instability of IAH's own titles, this might even be the 'Thimār al-akhbār wa-lā'iq al-ḥikāyāt wa-al-ash'ār'. The catalogue of the Iraqi Museum Library in Baghdad from 1985 has an IAH-autograph manuscript with such a title (al-Naqshbandī/Abbās, Makḥṭūṭāt al-adab, pp. 129–30, no. 34349). He wrote that manuscript in the year 873/1469, well before he composed his Naming my Books list. However, this list does not have a title 'Thimār al-akhbār...' and it is thus very likely that the Baghdad work is one of the other works in the list with a slight variation of the title. Among the possible candidates in the list, the 'Rā'iq al-akhbār wa-lā'iq al-ḥikāyāt wa-al-ash'ār' is the strongest candidate. C: adab. (cf. nos. 174a, 217e, 233j, 235b for other copies)

'Abd al-'Azīz al-Ḥanafī (dated 1078/1667); fol. 2a IAH-samā' for Bulbul, Ḥasan, his daughter Fāṭima, her mother Jawhara, 'Abd Allāh, 'Abd al-Hādī; title page fol. 2a IAH note (content list of CM); C: geography.

208b 13a/13–15 wa-Tasmiya li-kutubī; A: IAH ṭaṣnīfī; MS: Princeton, Garrett 273H/2, fols 47–58, undated; C: bibliography.

208c 13a/13–15 wa-Ashyā' min shi'r Shaykhinā al-Bā'ūnī; A: IAH ṭaṣnīfī; MS: Princeton, Garrett 273H/3, fols 59–66, undated; referring to his teacher Burhān al-Dīn Ibrāhīm b. Aḥmad al-Bā'ūnī (d. 870/1465); C: poetry – collection.

208d 13a/13–15 wa-Laqaṭ al-fawā'id; A: IAH ṭaṣnīfī; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 56b; MS: Princeton, Garrett 273H/4, fols 67–77, undated; fol. 67a IAH-samā' for Bulbul, son Badr al-Dīn(p), Fāṭima(p), Jawhara(p), 21.4.897/1492; title page fol. 67a also carries a fatwā by IAH on sale issue; C: ḥadīth – collection.

208e 13a/13–15 wa-al-Mukhtāra min aḥādīth masānīd Abī Ḥanīfa; A: IAH ṭaṣnīfī; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 57a; FI: kulluhu ṭaṣnīfī; MS: Princeton, Garrett 273H/5, fols 79–83, written 15.12.887/1483 in his house in al-Sahm al-a'lā; fol. 79a IAH-samā' for 'Abd al-Hādī(p); C: ḥadīth – collection.

209a 13b/1–6 wa-Majmū' fihī al-Qawl al-musaddad; This is most likely the work by A: Ibn Ḥajar (d. 852/1449) because IAH states that most of the titles in this CM are by himself and all the other titles can indeed be ascribed to IAH. MS: D 3749/1, fols 1–22 [FMMU 12, pp. 57–60] has this work under the title al-Qawl al-musaddad fī al-dhabb 'an musnad al-imām Aḥmad and carries on fol. 3a an IAH note (copied it for himself). This item

(together with another work by Ibn Ḥajar, cf. no. 263) was rebound with the remainder of CM 3749 at a later point as fol. 23a carries a contents list with the other items. This CM was endowed by Ibn Ṭūlūn to the 'Umarīya Madrasa (e.g. fol. 25a). As some of its other titles were also taken from the IAH-collection (cf. nos. 11 & 263) it seems that Ibn Ṭūlūn created with D 3749 a new ḥadīth related CM, mostly with titles by Ibn Ḥajar. rebinding; C: ḥadīth – study of.

209b 13b/1–6 wa-al-Intiṣār al-aḥmad; A: IAH; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 48b: 'al-Intiṣār al-aḥmad bi-musnad al-imām Aḥmad'; C: ḥadīth – study of.

209c 13b/1–6 wa-'Asharat 'Arafāt; A: IAH; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 55b; C: ḥadīth – collection – 10.

209d 13b/1–6 wa-al-'Ashara al-qudsīya; A: IAH; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 56a; C: ḥadīth – collection – 10.

209e 13b/1–6 wa-al-Khamsa al-Khalīliya; A: IAH; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 51a; C: ḥadīth – collection – 5.

209f 13b/1–6 wa-al-Khamsa al-maḥṣūra; A: IAH; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 51a; C: ḥadīth – collection – 5.

209g 13b/1–6 wa-al-Nashāt; A: IAH; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 57b: 'al-Nashāt li-dhikr man rumīya bi-al-ikhtilāt'; probably modelled on al-Ijtibāt li-ma'rifat man rumīya bi-al-ikhtilāt by Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad Sibṭ Ibn al-'Ajamī (d. 841/1438) (ed. 'A. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, Thalāth rasā'il fi 'ulūm al-ḥadīth, al-Zarqā: Al-Wikāla al-'Arabīya, c. 1984; C: ḥadīth – study of.

209h 13b/1–6 wa-al-'Ashara al-Yūnānīya; referring to the village of Yūnān close to Baalbek (Ba'labakk; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, p. 453); A: IAH; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 56a; C: ḥadīth – collection – 10.

209i 13b/1–6 wa-al-Taḥsīs; A: IAH; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 50a: 'al-Taḥsīs alā man yu'rafu bi-al-tadlīs'; C: ḥadīth – study of.

209j 13b/1–6 wa-al-Khamsa al-Karakīya; A: IAH; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 51a; C: ḥadīth – collection – 5.

209k 13b/1–6 wa-al-Tabyīn; A: IAH; As all titles in this CM, with the exception of the first, are by IAH and are in his Tasmiya-list we can expect the same for this title. In S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 50a we find two titles with the keyword tabyīn. The first of these (Tabyīn kidhb al-muftarīn) is matched further down (cf. no. 348a). In consequence the title here is most likely the second entry in the Tasmiya-list, his Tabyīn ta'dād al-mukhadramīn; C: ḥadīth – study of.

209l 13b/1–6 wa-al-Khamsa al-Nābulusīya; A: IAH; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 51a; C: ḥadīth – collection – 5.

209m 13b/1–6 wa-al-Riyād al-murta'a; A: IAH; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 54a: 'al-Riyād al-murta'a fi tahdhīb Ta'jīl al-manfa'a fi rijāl al-a'imma al-arba'a'; most likely referring to Ta'jīl al-manfa'a bi-zawā'id rijāl al-a'imma al-arba'a by Ibn Ḥajar (d. 852/1449) (ed. I. al-Ḥaqq, Beirut: DBI, 1996); FI: ghālibuhu taṣnīfī; C: ḥadīth – study of.

210a 13b/7–9 wa-Majmū' fihī al-Taṣrīḥ; possibly A: IAH; not identified.

210b 13b/7–9 wa-Ghāyat al-nuḥan; possibly A: IAH; not identified.

210c 13b/7–9 wa-al-Raghba; possibly A: IAH; not identified.

210d 13b/7–9 wa-al-Ihtimām; A: IAH; not identified. (cf. nos. 141c, 178e, 418d for further copies)

210e 13b/7–9 wa-al-Raghba; possibly A: IAH; not identified.

210f 13b/7–9 wa-Arba' in Asmā' al-Mihrawānīya; referring to the Damascene scholar Asmā' bt. 'Abd Allāh al-Mihrawānīya (d. 867/1462); most likely A: IAH; FI: wa-ghayr dhālika ghālibuhu taṣnīfī.

211a 13b/10–15 Majmū' fihī Tuḥfat al-ikhwān; A: IAH taṣnīfī; not identified.

- 212c 14a/1–6 wa-al-Iqtibās; A: IAH taṣnīfī; Most likely his al-Iqtibās li-waṣīyatīhi (invoc.) li-Ibn 'Abbās (al-Ṭarīqī, Muṣannafāt al-ḥanābila, V, pp. 60–1). His second main title with this keyword, al-Iqtibās li-ḥall mushkil sirat Ibn Sayyid al-nās, is manuscript D 3794/1, fols 1–47, but it was written after this *fihris*t had been composed, namely 15.11.907/1502.

232h 17a/5–10 wa-al-‘Ashara al-muntaqāt; A: IAH; probably identical to his S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 50b: ‘Juz’ min ḥadīth al-‘ashara muntaqā min al-Musnad’ or fol. 55a: ‘al-‘Ashara al-muntaqāt min al-mukhtāra’; C: ḥadīth – collection – 10.

232i 17a/5–10 wa-al-Arba‘īn; A: IAH; VP: 6th; on account of the numerous arba‘ūn works of IAH not identifiable; C: ḥadīth – collection – 40.

232j 17a/5–10 wa-al-Khamsa al-muntaqāt; A: IAH; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 51a: ‘al-Khamsa al-muntaqāt min al-mukhtāra’; C: ḥadīth – collection – 5.

232k 17a/5–10 wa-Fawā'id al-Ṣūlī; A: Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā al-Ṣūlī (d. 335/947); S: al-Juz' fīhi aḥādīth wa-akhbār 'an ... al-Ṣūlī, in: Ibn Manda, al-Fawā'id, ed. Kh. ‘Abd al-Samī’, Beirut: DKI, 2002, II, pp. 10–18; C: ḥadīth – collection.

232l 17a/5–10 wa-al-Arba‘īn al-mukhtāra; A: IAH; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 47b: ‘al-Arba‘īn al-mukhtāra min al-mukhtāra’; FI: ghālibuhu taṣnīfī; C: ḥadīth – collection – 40.

233a 17a/11–17 wa-Majmū' fīhi Amālī Ibn Nāṣir al-Dīn; A: Muḥammad b. ‘Abd Allāh Ibn Nāṣir al-Dīn (d. 842/1438); VP: majlis min; C: ḥadīth – collection.

233b 17a/11–17 wa-K. al-Taḥdhīr min al-qaḍā'; A: IAH; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 50a: ‘al-Taḥdhīr min al-qaḍā' fī al-sukḥt wa-al-riḍā'’; C: fiqh.

233c 17a/11–17 wa-Masā'il Ibn Hānī' 'an Aḥmad; A: Iṣḥāq b. Ibrāhīm Ibn Hānī' (d. 275/888–9); S: Masā'il al-imām Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal riwāyat Iṣḥāq b. Ibrāhīm Ibn Hānī', ed. Z. al-Shāwīsh, Beirut: al-Maktab al-Islāmī, 1979–80; C: fiqh – ḥanbalī. (cf. no. 389)

298 20b/11 K. Aḥkām al-ḥammām; A: Ḥamza b. Mūsā Ibn Shaykh al-Salāmīya (d. 769/1368); IAH mentions this author’s multi-volume ‘Muntaqā fī al-aḥkām’ (IAH, al-Jawhar, pp. 34–7) of which this entry might be one part. C: fiqh – ḥanbalī.

309 21a/8 K. al-Muwatta' riwāyat Yaḥyā b. Bukayr; A: Mālik b. Anas (d. 179/796); transmitted by Yaḥyā b. Bukayr (d. 231/845); C: ḥadīth – collection/fiqh – māliki.

310 21a/9 K. Makārim al-akhlāq; A: Muḥammad b. Ja'far al-Kharā'itī (d. 327/937); S: ed. M.M. al-Ḥāfiẓ/Gh. Budayr, Damascus: Dar al-Fikr, 1986; MS: Damascus, al-Majma' al-'ilmī 26; fols 9b, 19b, 29b, 39b IAH-samā' for scholar, 18–24.9.905/1500, 'Umarīya Madrasa; The title page of this manuscript is lost and it is thus impossible to ascertain whether it carries the usual features of manuscripts owned by IAH. However, as this manuscript carries *samā'*s in his name, including one with his signature (fol. 29b), and as these readings took place in the ‘Umarīya Madrasa, it is reasonable to suggest that no. 310 matches this manuscript. C: ethics (Prophet). (cf. 404m & 503j)

311 21a/10 K. Sharḥ risālat Ibn Zaydūn; A: Muḥammad b. Muḥammad Ibn Nubāta al-Miṣrī (d. 768/1366); S: ed. M.A. Ibrāhīm, Cairo: DF al-‘Arabī, 1964; C: adab.

312 21a/11 K. Mukhtaṣar al-sīra; A: ‘Alī b. ‘Abd al-Muḥsin Ibn al-Dūwālībī Shaykhunā (d. 858/1454); MS: D 1076 [FM/1, pp. 241–4], which contains the sīra (fols 1–5) and other (partly ‘autobiographical’) works by Ibn al-Dūwālībī; C: biography/ḥadīth.

313 21a/12 K. al-Jihād; A: Ismā‘il b. ‘Umar Ibn Kathīr (d. 774/1373); S: Kitāb al-ijtihād fī ṭalab al-jihād, ed. ‘A. ‘Asyālān, Beirut: MR, 1981; C: ḥadīth – collection.

314 21a/13 Sharḥ al-Bukhārī; A: Ibn Rajab (d. 795/1392); S: Faḥ al-Bārī: sharḥ Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bukhārī, ed. M. Ibn ‘Abd al-Maqṣūd, Medina: Maktabat al-Ghurabā’ al-Atharīya, 1999; VP: 3 mujalladāt; C: ḥadīth – commentary. (cf. no. 573d)

315 21b/1 Musnad Abī Ya‘lā; A: Aḥmad b. ‘Alī Abū Ya‘lā al-Mawṣilī (d. 307/919); S: ed. M. ‘Aṭā’, Beirut: DKI, 1998; VP: mujallad 10 ajzā’ min; C: ḥadīth – collection. (cf. no. 449)

316 21b/2 K. Manzūmat al-Ṣarṣarī zawā‘id al-Kāfi; referring to the work by ‘Umar b. al-Ḥusayn al-Khiraqī (d. 334/945, cf. no. 308); A: Yaḥyā b. Yūsuf al-Ṣarṣarī (d. 658/1258); MS: D 2749, fols 1–94 [FM/2, p. 107], ‘Nazm zawā‘id al-Kāfi ‘alā al-Khiraqī’; The second title in this ‘CM’ is a 3-folio poem by the same author, again on Ḥanbali fiqh, and the third title is a 2-folio poem by another author, so IAH registered this MS as a single-text manuscript. C: fiqh – ḥanbalī – didactic poem.

317 21b/3 K. Nukat Ibn Muflīḥ; A: Muḥammad b. Muflīḥ al-Maqdisī al-Ḥanbalī (d. 763/1362); S: al-Muḥarrar: wa-ma‘ahu al-Nukat wa-al-fawā‘id al-saniya ‘alā mushkil al-Muḥarrar, ed. ‘A. al-Turkī, Beirut: MR, 2007; C: fiqh – ḥanbalī.

318 21b/4 K. al-Sīra; A: Ibn Hishām (d. 218/833 or 213/828); VP: 4 mujalladāt; MS: D 1875 (vol. 22 and vol. 24), written in 548/1153–4, is most likely one of the four volumes mentioned here as it was part of the ‘Umarīya Madrasa Library collection: Ottoman Public Library: al-sīra al-nabawīya 22 (‘Umarīya provenance); Jerusalem, National Library of Israel, MS Yahuda 406 [Wust, Catalogue, pp. 643–4] carries on fol. 261b IAH-samā’ for scholars, 904/1499, but this is the ‘first of five parts [ajzā’]’ and has a distinctively different layout so a match is thus rather unlikely. Leiden, University of Leiden, MS or. 482 has an IAH akhbaranā-note, but the work’s title Mukhtaṣar Sīrat Rasūl Allāh makes it again a rather weak contender. C: biography of the Prophet (sīra).

319 21b/5 K. Sunan Abī Dāwūd; A: Abū Dāwūd al-Sijistānī (d. 275/889); VP: 3 mujalladāt; MS: D 1006, 1007, 1008; W’U; Ottoman Public Library: ḥadīth 215–7 (‘Umarīya provenance); C: ḥadīth – collection.

320 21b/6 al-Radd al-kabīr; A: Ibn Taymīya al-Shaykh Taqī al-Dīn (d. 728/1328); S: al-Ṭarīqī, Muṣannaḥāt al-ḥanābila, III, p. 467; VP: 1st; C: fiqh – ḥanbalī.

321 21b/7 K. al-Laṭā’if; A: Ibn Rajab (d. 795/1392); S: Laṭā’if al-ma’arīf fi mā li-mawāsīm al-‘ām min al-wazā’if, ed. Y. M. al-Sawwās, Damascus/Beirut: DIK, 1998; C: rituals.

322 21b/8 al-Manzūma al-kubrā; A: Muḥammad b. ‘Abd al-Qawī al-Maqdisī (d. 699/1299); VP: 1st; C: fiqh – ḥanbalī.

323 21b/9 K. al-Hādī; A: al-Shaykh Muwaffaq al-Dīn Ibn Qudāma al-Maqdisī (d. 620/1223); S: Kitāb al-Hādī aw ‘Umdat al-ḥāzim fi al-zawā’id ‘alā mukhtaṣar Abī al-Qāsim, ed. N. Ṭālib, Damascus: Dār al-Nawādir, 2011; C: fiqh – ḥanbalī.

324 21b/10 K. al-Ḥudūd; A: Ibrāhīm b. ‘Alī al-Shīrāzī Abū Ishāq (d. 476/1083); C: fiqh – shāfi‘ī.

325 21b/11 Mashyakhat Ibn Ṭarkhān; A: Muḥammad b. Yahyā al-Maqdisī (d. 759/1357–8); S: ed. Ḥ. Tawfiq/‘A. Fu’ād, Beirut: Dār al-Nawādir, 2013; C: mashyakha. (cf. 247b)

326 21b/12 al-Tirmidhī [al-Jāmi‘ al-ṣaḥīḥ]; A: Muḥammad b. ‘Īsā al-Tirmidhī (d. 279/892); VP: 1st; MS: D 1021; fol. 279a waqf by Ibn ‘Urwa; fol. 62a IAH akhbaranā-notes; fol. 62a samā’ for IAH, 16.2.870/1465 (also fol. 94a, 17.2.870 + marginal bulūgh notes); fol. 279a IAH note (reading ‘muṭāla‘a’); Ottoman Public Library: ḥadīth 230 (‘Umarīya provenance); C: ḥadīth – collection. (cf. no. 336 for 2nd volume)

327a 21b/13–14 Majmū‘ fihī al-Minḥa; This might be A: IAH’s al-Minḥa fī taḍmīn al-Mulḥa (al-Ṭarīqī, Muṣannafāt al-ḥanābila, V, p. 120), probably a commentary on the grammatical work Mulḥat al-i‘rāb by al-Qāsim b. ‘Alī al-Ḥarīrī al-Baṣrī (d. 516/1122, ed. B.Y. Habbūd, Sidon 1997) on which IAH’s brother had also written a commentary (cf. no. 26). C: grammar.

327b 21b/13–14 wa-Kitāb fī al-‘arūd; As neither author nor title are given, it is impossible to identify this book on C: metrics.

327c 21b/13–14 wa-Badī‘īya; Most likely a poem in praise of the Prophet Muḥammad. On account of the other titles in this CM arguably with a commentary on lexicographical and grammatical issues, similar to al-Ḥulla al-siyarā‘ (though less voluminous) by al-Ru‘aynī (d. 779/1377; cf. Bonebakker, Ru‘aynī’s commentary). FI: wa-ghayr dhālika; C: rhetoric.

328 22a/1 al-Radd ‘alā al-Rāfiḍī; A: Ibn Taymiya al-Shaykh Taqī al-Dīn (d. 728/1328); Most likely a section against ‘Allāma al-Ḥillī (d. 726/1325) from the author’s Minḥāj al-sunna (ed. M. Sālim, Cairo: Maktabat Dār al-‘Urūba, 1964); VP: mujalladayn; C: theology.

329a 22a/2 Majmū‘ fihī al-Ṭā‘ūn; A: Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziya (d. 751/1350); S: al-Ṭarīqī, Muṣannafāt al-ḥanābila, IV, p. 94; C: medicine.

329b 22a/2 wa-al-Jarād; possibly A: IAH; C: fiqh – ḥanbalī. (cf. no. 76b for identification)

329c 22a/2 wa-Dhamm al-ta‘wīl; A: al-Shaykh Muwaffaq al-Dīn Ibn Qudāma al-Maqdisī (d. 620/1223); S: in: al-Rasā‘il al-sab‘a fī al-‘aqā‘id, Cairo: Dār al-Baṣā‘ir, 2009; C: theology.

330 22a/3 K. Manāzil al-sā‘irīn; A: ‘Abd Allāh b. Muḥammad Shaykh al-Islām al-Anṣārī al-Ḥanbalī (d. 481/1089); S: ed. T. Wahba, Cairo: Maktabat al-Thaqāfa al-Dīniya, 2007; FI: wa-mā ma‘abu; C: Sufism.

331a 22a/4–5 Majmū' fihī al-Bur'; on account of other titles in this CM referring most likely to the Ḥīlat al-bur' by A: Galen;⁸⁶ arguably MS: Chester Beatty Ar 4001/2, fols 9b–14: 'Jawāmi' arba'at 'ashar maqāla min K. Jālinūs fī ḥīlat al-bur'', written in 730/1329–30; C: pharmacology.

331b 22a/4–5 wa-fihī Risāla fī al-ḥudūd; arguably MS: Chester Beatty Ar 4001/1, fols 1–9a; 'R. fī al-ḥudūd al-ṭibbiya''; IAH unusually so repeats the term 'wa-fihī', probably because he mixed up the order of texts. C: medicine.

331c 22a/4–5 wa-Fuṣūl Abqrāt; probably referring to Galen's Commentary on Hippocrates' Aphorisms; A: Galen; S: Ullmann, Medizin, 50; C: medicine.

332 22a/6 K. al-Muntakhab fī al-fiqh; A: Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Adamī (d. c. 749/1348); S: al-Ṭarīqī, Muṣannafāt al-ḥanābila, IV, p. 355; C: fiqh – ḥanbalī. (cf. no. 172a for 2nd copy)

333 22a/7 K. Asbāb al-hidāya; A: Ibn al-Jawzī (d. 597/1200); S: al-Ṭarīqī, Muṣannafāt al-ḥanābila, II, p. 312; C: fiqh – ḥanbalī.

334a 22a/8–11 Majmū' fihī Mas'ala fī qawlihi Yā ayyuhā al-nās u' budū rabbakum. The titles in this CM are clearly not fully fledged book titles, but extracts and sections from larger texts. IAH defines this to be the work by 'al-Shaykh'. This title without any further name is used in this fihrist only for Ibn Taymīya. A: Ibn Taymīya al-Shaykh Taqī al-Dīn (d. 728/1328); S: in: al-Fatāwā al-kubrā, eds M. 'Aṭā/M. 'Aṭā, Beirut: DKI, V, pp. 154–218; C: theology.

334b 22a/8–11 Mas'ala fī al-khayr wa-al-sharr; A: Ibn Taymīya al-Shaykh Taqī al-Dīn (d. 728/1328); not identified.

334c 22a/8–11 wa-Faṣl min al-qawā'id al-kibār; A: Ibn Taymīya al-Shaykh Taqī al-Dīn (d. 728/1328); C: theology.

334d 22a/8–11 wa-Su'āl manẓūm; A: Ibn Taymīya al-Shaykh Taqī al-Dīn (d. 728/1328).

334e 22a/8–11 wa-Qā'ida fī al-tawḥīd; A: Ibn Taymīya al-Shaykh Taqī al-Dīn (d. 728/1328); C: theology.

⁸⁶ Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī, Fihrist, ed. Kharsa, no. 931 reads الروضة رسالة في الحدود and ascribes it to Sulaymān b. Khalaf al-Bājī (d. 474/1081).

334f 22a/8–11 wa-Mas'alat al-istiwā'; A: Ibn Taymīya al-Shaykh Taqī al-Dīn (d. 728/1328). This might be linked with the question of God's attributes, namely the meaning of him sitting (istiwā') on the throne, but the spelling in the fihrist is unconventional. C: theology. (cf. no. 276)

334g 22a/8–11 wa-Mas'ala fi da'wat dhī al-nūn; A: Ibn Taymīya al-Shaykh Taqī al-Dīn (d. 728/1328); S: in: al-Fatāwā al-kubrā, eds M. 'Aṭā/M. 'Aṭā, Beirut: DKI, V, pp. 218–36; FI: wa-ghayr dhālika; C: theology.

335 22a/12 K. al-Radd 'alā al-naṣārā; A: Ibn Taymīya al-Shaykh Taqī al-Dīn (d. 728/1328); cf. no. 334a for identification of 'al-Sahykh'; VP: 3 mujalladāt; C: theology.

336 22a/13 al-Tirmidhī [al-Jāmi' al-ṣaḥīḥ]; A: Muḥammad b. 'Isā al-Tirmidhī (d. 279/892); VP: 2nd mujallad; MS: D 1022; That IAH records vols 1 and 2 of the same work as two separate entries (cf. no. 326 for 1st volume) requires an explanation: This could be down to mere oversight, but more likely this was a conscious decision as the two volumes were independent codicological units written in different hands and with a radically different page layout. They came together at some point (1022 has on fol. 1a the same waqf note by Ibn 'Urwa (fragmentary) as 1021 on fol. 279a), but they must have retained independent identities. Ottoman Public Library: ḥadīth 231 ('Umarīya provenance); C: ḥadīth – collection.

337a 22b/1–4 Majmū' taṣnīf akhī fihī Akhbār Ibn Adham; A: Aḥmad b. Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī (d. 895/1490), taṣnīf akhī; Together with nos. 357 and 358 this is one of the CMs that IAH describes with 'taṣnīf akhī'. I take this as referring to the authorship of his brother for the titles in the respective CM. Most of these titles are not identifiable either via references in other works or via extant manuscripts and numerous readings are tentative. The reading of the name in this title is tentative, but likely as IAH himself also has a title on this ascetic and ṣūfī Ibrāhīm b. Adham (d. 161/777–8?); C: biography – individual.

337b 22b/1–4 wa-Muntaqā min kutub Ibn Rajab; referring to Ibn Rajab (d. 795/1392); A: Aḥmad b. Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī (d. 895/1490), taṣnīf akhī.

337c 22b/1–4 wa-al-Zuhd; A: Aḥmad b. Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī (d. 895/1490), taṣnīf akhī.

337d 22b/1–4 wa-al-Ḥiṣn al-kabīr; A: Aḥmad b. Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī (d. 895/1490), taṣnīf akhī; S: al-Ṭarīqī, Muṣannaḥāt al-ḥanābila, V, p. 19. (cf. no. 357b)

337e 22b/1–4 wa-al-Fawā'id al-ghazira; A: Aḥmad b. Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī (d. 895/1490), taṣnīf akhī.

337f 22b/1–4 wa-Ad'iya; A: Aḥmad b. Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī (d. 895/1490), taṣnīf akhī; C: prayer book.

337g 22b/1–4 wa-Mansak al-Shaykh Muwaffaq al-Dīn; referring to al-Shaykh Muwaffaq al-Dīn Ibn Qudāma al-Maqdisī (d. 620/1223); A: Aḥmad b. Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī (d. 895/1490), taṣnīf akhī; FI: wa-ghayr dhālika; C: rituals.

338 22b/5 K. Ibn Abī al-Majd fī al-fiqh; A: Abū Bakr b. Abī al-Majd (d. 804/1401); S: al-Ṭarīqī, Muṣannaḥāt al-ḥanābila, IV, p. 268: 'Mukhtaṣar fī al-fiqh'; C: fiqh – ḥanbalī.

339a 22b/6–17 Majmū' fīhi Maḥāsin al-adhkār; most likely (cf. 165m) A: Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr Ibn Zayd Shihāb al-Dīn (d. 870/1465–6).

339b 22b/6–17 wa-Sharḥ gharāmī ṣaḥīḥ; Numerous commentaries of this didactic poem by Aḥmad b. Faraḥ al-Ishbilī al-Shāfi'ī (d. 671/1273), who settled and died in Damascus, are extant. Consequently, it is impossible to speculate on the authorship of this specific commentary. C: ḥadīth – study of – didactic poem. (cf. no. 357h)

339c 22b/6–17 wa-Ḥadīth ḍarb mathal al-'ilm; tentative reading; not identified.

339d 22b/6–17 wa-K. Ghunyat al-ṭālib; not identified.

339e 22b/6–17 *wa-Qā'ida nikāḥīya*⁸⁷; A: Ibn Taymīya al-Shaykh Taqī al-Dīn (d. 728/1328); S: in: al-Fatāwā al-kubrā, eds M. 'Aṭā/M. 'Aṭā, Beirut: DKI, III, pp. 227–33; C: fiqh – ḥanbalī.

⁸⁷ Ibn 'Abd al-Hādī, Fihrist, ed. Kharsa, no. 877 reads الخاصة.

339f 22b/6–17 wa-Juz'; unidentified text most likely by the great official and minor Ḥanbali scholar A: Muḥammad b. 'Uthmān al-Āmidī Ibn al-Ḥaddād (d. 724/1324, al-Dhahabī, Tārīkh al-islām, years 701–46, p. 230).

339g 22b/6–17 wa-K. al-Muttafiq wa-al-muftariq; extract from the work by A: Aḥmad b. 'Alī al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī (d. 463/1071); S: ed. M. al-Ḥāmidī, Beirut/Damascus: Dār al-Qādirī, 1997; C: ḥadīth – study of.

339h 22b/6–17 wa-al-Radd 'alā man yud'ī al-waḍ' 'alā ba'd aḥādīth al-musnad; not identified; C: ḥadīth – study of.

339i 22b/6–17 wa-al-Tuḥfa wa-al-fā'ida; A: Yūsuf b. Aḥmad Ibn Abī 'Umar al-Šāliḥī (d. 798/1396); S: IAH, al-Jawhar, p. 174; C: fiqh – ḥanbalī.

339j 22b/6–17 wa-Kalām Ibn al-Khaṭīb; possibly A: Muḥammad b. 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Khaṭīb (d. 776/1375).

339k 22b/6–17 wa-al-Thamara al-rā'iqā; A: IAH taṣnīfī; C: grammar. (cf. no. 128e for identification)

382 26b/5 K. al-Muḥaddith al-fāṣil; (= al-Muḥaddith al-fāṣil bayna al-rāwī wa-al-wā'i); A: al-Ḥasan b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Khallād al-Rāmahurmuzī (d. 360/971); MS: D 1191, fol. 1a WD; Ottoman Public Library: ḥadīth 400 ('Umarīya provenance); C: ḥadīth – study of.

383 26b/6 K. al-Khulāṣa fī al-fiqh; A: As'ad b. al-Munajjā al-Ḥanbalī (d. 606/1209); S: al-Ṭarīqī, Muṣannafāt al-ḥanābila, III, p. 12. There are other possibilities for this entry, including the Khulāṣat al-fatāwī fī tashīl asrār al-Ḥāwī by the Shāfi'ī scholar Ibn al-Mulaqqīn (MS D 2266–70). However, in the context of IAH's book collection the title by the Damascene Ḥanbalī author al-Munajjā is most likely, especially as other authors routinely cite it as 'Khulāṣa' (e.g. al-Dhababī, Tārīkh al-islām, years 601–10, pp. 200–1); C: fiqh – ḥanbalī.

384 26b/7 K. al-'Umda fī al-fiqh; A: al-Shaykh Muwaffaq al-Dīn Ibn Qudāma al-Maqdisī (d. 620/1223); MS: D 2695, written in 743/1443; fol. 1a is heavily damaged, but W'Ual-Najdī is very faintly visible; Ottoman Public Library: fiqh al-ḥanābila 6 ('Umarīya provenance); C: fiqh – ḥanbalī.

385 26b/8 K. Idrāk al-ghāya fī al-fiqh; A: 'Abd al-Mu'min b. 'Abd al-Ḥaqq al-Baghdadī (d. 639/1338); S: ed. Y. al-Mazrū'ī, Kuwait: Ghirās, 2009; C: fiqh – ḥanbalī.

387 26b/10 K. '...ā⁹⁶ Miṣr; unclear reading.

388 26b/11 K. al-Īdāb fī al-fiqh; Even with the addition 'fī al-fiqh', there are too many possible titles to securely identify this book. A strong contender, on account of this book collection's profile is al-Īdāh li-qawānīn al-iṣṭilāh by Ibn al-Jawzī (d. 597/1200, ed. F. al-Sadhān, Riyadh: Maktabat al-'Ubaykān, 1991); C: fiqh.

389 26b/12 K. Masā'il Ishāq b. Hāni' an Aḥmad; A: Ishāq b. Ibrāhīm Ibn Hāni' (d. 275/888–9); S: Masā'il al-imām Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal riwāyat Ishāq b. Ibrāhīm Ibn Hāni', ed. (cf. no. 233c)

390 27a/1 K. Sharḥ muqaddimat al-uṣūl; Most likely, though again unusual for this book collection (cf. 344 & 514a), this refers to an unidentified commentary on the introduction of al-Dhari'a ilā uṣūl al-sharī'a by the imāmī author 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn al-Sharīf al-Murtaḍā (d. 436/1044); C: uṣūl al-fiqh.

391a 27a/2–9 Majmū' fihī Ghāyat al-khaṭir wa-al-lawm; tentative reading; This entire MTM (more likely) or CM is in the hand of 'Ibn Ḥamdān'. This is most likely Aḥmad Ibn Ḥamdān al-Ḥanbalī (d. 695/1295) who repeatedly appears in this fihrist (cf. nos. 40, 194, 279 and 408). IAH also owned other manuscripts with texts by this author, which do not appear in this fihrist (for example D 2694 [FM/2, pp. 99–101] with ownership note by IAH and W'Ual-Najdī). The most striking element of the titles in this MTM/CM is that even though they are clearly legible, most of them are not identifiable, partly because the title is unknown (e.g. 391c) and partly because the keyword is too generic (e.g. 391f). Scr: bi-khaṭṭ Ibn Ḥamdān (Aḥmad Ibn Ḥamdān al-Ḥanbalī, d. 695/1295).

391b 27a/2–9 wa-Risālat 'Abdūs; A: Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal (d. 241/855); Scr: bi-khaṭṭ Ibn Ḥamdān (Aḥmad Ibn Ḥamdān al-Ḥanbalī, d. 695/1295); C: theology. (cf. no. 458b)

391c 27a/2–9 wa-Khulāṣat al-ḥukm al-makhtūm; Scr: bi-khaṭṭ Ibn Ḥamdān (Aḥmad Ibn Ḥamdān al-Ḥanbalī, d. 695/1295); not identified (cf. comments in no. 391a).

407 30a/3 K. Gharīb al-ḥadīth; The fihrist gives the author as 'Abū 'Ubayd', which would be Abū 'Ubayd al-Qāsim al-Harawī (ed. M. Khān, Hyderabad: Dā'irat al-Ma'ārif al-'Uthmāniya, 1964–67). However, it is likely that this is a mistake and that the work in question was written by A: 'Abd Allāh b. Muslim Ibn Qutayba (d. 276/889). VP: mujalladayn; Two volumes of this work (the number matching the information given in the fihrist) were part of the 'Umarīya collection and carry endowment notes for the Ḍiyā'īya Madrasa, i.e. matching the institutional trajectory of most IAH manuscripts. W'Umarīya; Potentially 455 could also be matched with D 1023, especially as D 1021 & D 1022 (vols 1 and 2 of the same work) are matched above (326 & 336). However, while IAH does link 326 and 336 above by stating that 336 is the 'the second volume', he does not do so in this entry but merely identifies it as being 'in one volume'. It is thus very unlikely that D 1023 (vol. 3 of the same work) is meant here. Moreover, 1232 carries the relevant endowment notes and even though it is classified as a CM in FM/1 it is rather a single-text manuscript with reuse of 'old' manuscripts. C: ḥadīth – collection.

473c 40b/4–6 wa-al-Shamā’il; most likely A: Muḥammad b. ‘Īsā al-Tirmidhī (d. 279/892); S: Shamā’il al-nabī, ed. M. Faḥl, Beirut: Dār al-Gharb al-Islāmī, 2008; C: biography of the Prophet (sīra). (cf. no. 517e)

474 40b/7–8 Musnad al-Rūyānī; A: Muḥammad b. Hārūn al-Rūyānī Abū Bakr (d. 307/920); VP: 33 juz’ fī mujalladayn; MS: D 1069 is the second of the two volumes mentioned here containing parts 16–33; WD; fol. 1a IAH akhhbaranā-note; fol. 1a IAH-samā’ for ‘Abd al-Hādī, ‘Abd Allāh, Ḥasan; C: ḥadīth – collection.

475a 40b/9–12 Majmū’ fīhi al-Shāfi; A: IAH; S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 54b; FI: qit’ā min; Above (cf. no. 172e) this keyword referred to the work by Muwaffaq al-Dīn Ibn Qudāma al-Maqdisī (d. 620/1223). However, as IAH states that most titles in this CM are by him, it is more likely his al-Shāfi mukhtaṣar al-Kāfi. This, in turn, is most likely a summary of Muwaffaq al-Dīn’s al-Kāfi (cf. no. 44). C: fiqh – ḥanbalī.

475b 40b/9–12 wa-Sīrat Bardbak; This title is most likely another panegyric by A: IAH as we find in IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 50a the same name in the title: ‘al-Taghrīd fī madḥ al-Malik al-Sa’īd (Bardbak)’ with ‘Bardbak’ as an interlinear addition. The probability that this is a panegyric is increased by the fact that this CM has another panegyric (cf. no. 475g). Bardbak was a moderately popular name among the Mamluk elite. As the previous panegyrics of IAH (cf. nos. 169d, 174e, 219g) referred to contemporary rulers, this is most likely the case here as well. The strongest candidate for this work is the governor of Damascus Bardbak who led the Syrian army in 872/1467 against the Dhū al-Qadrit ruler Shāh Sawwār. However, one wonders when this panegyric was written as the battle ended in a disaster for the Mamluks and Bardbak was taken prisoner. Perhaps this is rather an ironic work, especially when considering that the previous panegyrics were written for rivals of the Mamluks. C: panegyric.

475c 40b/9–12 wa-al-Kanjī; A: Muḥammad b. Muḥammad al-Kanjī (d. 682/1283); VP: 2nd; Unusually, IAH only gives the compiler's name, not a title. The author proposed here is probably meant when he uses this rare nisba (relational name). This was a Jerusalemite ḥadīth scholar who was also active in Damascus and is known to have authored a work on his teachers (mu'jam) (al-Dhababī, Tārīkh al-islām, years 681–90, pp. 127/8). Most likely this is thus the second volume of some kind of C: ḥadīth – collection.

475d 40b/9–12 *D...*¹¹⁴; not identified.

475e 40b/9–12 wa-Maqāma; A: IAH; most likely one of the two maqāmāt he mentions in S: IAH, Tasmiya, fol. 57a.

475f 40b/9–12 wa-al-Irshād; most likely A: IAH; FI: musawwada. As most titles in this CM are by IAH and this is a draft (musawwada), his authorship is likely. However, it is impossible to exactly identify the title as IAH had a strong inclination to use the keyword 'irshād' in his titles (cf. nos. 68a, 76b, 108, 134b, 141e, 178g, 186i, 188c, 191d, 203b, 212b, 212h, 213a, 213c, 462l in addition to extant manuscripts with irshād-titles not mentioned in this fihrīst such as MS D 3794/3, fols 61–7 [FMMU 58, pp. 287–9], autograph, al-Irshād ilā ittiṣāl bānat Su'ād bi-zakī al-Isnād and MS D 3216/18, fols 202–7 [FM/2, pp. 241–8], autograph, Irshād al-fatā ilā aḥādīth al-shitā).

475g 40b/9–12 wa-al-Taghrīd; A: IAH; C: panegyric. (cf. no. 174e for identification)

475h 40b/9–12 wa-Akhhbār Quss; most likely referring to the pre-Islamic sage and orator Quss b. Sā'ida who appears elsewhere in this fihrīst (cf. nos. 125b & 467k); C: poetry – pre-Islamic – commentary.

475i 40b/9–12 wa-al-Nisba; tentative reading; not identified.

537a 50b/11–14 Majmū’ fihī Fawā’id al-Qaṭī’i; A: al-Ḥāfiẓ ‘Abd al-Ghanī b. ‘Abd al-Wāḥid al-Maḥdisī (d. 600/1203); S: FMMU, p. 208; VP: 4th; C: ḥadīth – collection.

537b 50b/11–14 wa-al-Kamāl; A: al-Ḥāfiẓ ‘Abd al-Ghanī b. ‘Abd al-Wāḥid al-Maḥdisī (d. 600/1203); VP: juz’ min; Potentially this could be MS: D 1157, which is the first volume of this work with the typical provenance (WḌ) and typical tractory (going into the Zāhiriya from the ‘Umarīya); Ottoman Public Library: ḥadīth 366 (‘Umarīya provenance). However, D 1157 is too voluminous (224 fols) to have been part of this CM; see also 537d; rebinding; C: ḥadīth – biographical dictionary.

537c 50b/11–14 wa-al-Jāmi’ al-ṣaghīr; A: al-Ḥāfiẓ ‘Abd al-Ghanī b. ‘Abd al-Wāḥid al-Maḥdisī (d. 600/1203); VP: 5th, 6th; This is most likely MS: D 1025/5 [FM/1, 214–8], which has several volumes of this work, some of which are incomplete. D 1025 is a CM that includes parts of CMs that had formerly been in the IAH collection, namely 537c, e, f. Apart from the striking overlap in titles, the link with IAH is e.g. evident from fol. 11a IAH note (claims ijāza for himself). rebinding; C: ḥadīth – collection.

537d 50b/11–14 wa-al-Kamāl; A: al-Ḥāfiẓ ‘Abd al-Ghanī b. ‘Abd al-Wāḥid al-Maḥdisī (d. 600/1203); VP: juz’ ākhar min; potentially MS: D 1158, which is the fourth volume of this work, but see comments in 537b, which are also valid for this manuscript of 166 fols; rebinding; Ottoman Public Library: ḥadīth 367 (‘Umarīya provenance); C: ḥadīth – biographical dictionary.

537e 50b/11–14 wa-K. al-Alqāb; A: ‘Abd Allāh b. Muḥammad al-Faraḍī (d. 403/1012–13); most likely MS: D 1025/6, fols 125–8, 133–63 [FM/1, 214–8]. See comments in 537c on the link between parts of 537 and D 1025. C: ḥadīth – biographical dictionary.

537f 50b/11–14 wa-‘Iddat ajzā’; Scr: bi-khaṭṭ al-Ḥāfiẓ (‘Abd al-Ghanī b. ‘Abd al-Wāḥid al-Maqdisī, d. 600/1203); This probably refers to incomplete parts of autograph manuscripts by ‘Abd al-Ghanī that are so common in the IAH collection. 537f thus most likely matches parts of MS: D 1025/3 [FM/1, 214–8]. See comments in 537c on the link between parts of 537 and D 1025. C: ijāza.

The Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī fihrist: Edition

The Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī catalogue is preserved in a unique single-text autograph manuscript in the National al-Asad Library (MS 3190). The fihrist is not dated, but, as argued in Chapter 2, it was probably written in the year 897/1492. The manuscript consists of fifty-eighth folia, measuring 185×135 millimetres. It shows signs of minor deterioration caused by water and insects, but the text is undamaged. It is written in Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī’s characteristic naskhī script with occasionally pointed letters and hardly any use of vocalization signs. The text is monochrome in black ink. For rubrications, wider line spacing and elongated strokes are employed.

As with most manuscripts written by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī, the area that is written on varies considerably between pages. The 114 pages with full text have between twelve (folio 26b) and nineteen lines (folia 45b and 48b). The line spacing is irregular and there are no marks of pricking and ruling (which would anyway have been very surprising considering the irregular page layout). The Arabic foliation is in pencil at the top left corner, with folio 58b incorrectly numbered as ‘59’ (or rather the writer of these numbers changed here to a page numbering system). The title page carries two stamps, one of the al-Maktaba al-‘umūmīya in Arabic (also on folia 30a and 58b) and one of the Zāhiriya Library in Arabic and French (also on folio 5b). Besides the first stamp the word ‘‘Umarīya’ was added to indicate the manuscript’s provenance after its transferral to the new Public Library. At this point the class mark ‘19’ was added as well (al-adabīyāt al-manthūra 19). Next to it we find the current class mark ‘3190’ in pencil. The catalogue consists of six quires: one quaternion (folia 1–8) and six quinions (folia 9–18, 19–28, 29–38, 39–48 and 49–58). Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī numbered the first four quires (folia 1a, 9a, 19a and 29a). Catchwords are not used. Folia 35a and 48b carry modern corrections in blue pen referring to the actual manuscripts matching these two entries (using the old al-Maktaba al-‘umūmīya/Zāhiriya class mark number Majmū‘ 93 and Majmū‘ 31).

The below numbering is meant to replicate the entry system used by Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī. The numbers assigned here have been added to the manuscript reproductions in part II of the plate section in red. For the sake of legibility, the orthography has been standardised in the following to bring it into a form familiar to modern readers. The text is reproduced with fully pointed letters and with hamza, although the latter is, typically for Middle Arabic, generally weakened in the manuscript. The hamza is inconsistently used in ‘ibn’ and this has not been changed in the edition (for instance, in numbers 4, 7, 95, 165, 189, 197, 200, 225 and many more). The use of numerals shows considerable differences to classical Arabic and the choices of Ibn ‘Abd al-Hādī have been retained here – for instance, he uses ‘aḥad’ instead of ‘iḥdā’ (number 87), ‘ithnayn’ instead of ‘ithmatayn’ (number 105), ‘thālith’ instead of ‘thalātha’ (number 256), ‘sitt majālis’ instead of ‘sittat majālis’ (number 531). In the same vein, he did not follow the classical rules on cases – for instance, ‘15 ḥadīth’ instead of ‘15 ḥadīth^{an}’ (number 542), ‘11 ḥadīth’ instead of ‘11 ḥadīthan’ (number 574), ‘50 ḥadīth’ instead of ‘50 ḥadīth^{an}’ (number 578) and ‘ishrūn’ instead of ‘ishrīn’ (number 431c). Orthographical choices such as writing the alif maqṣūra as an alif are also retained – for instance, fatwā (number 339), al-a‘lā (number 411), al-Mu‘āfā (number 458), al-ṣughrā (number 472) and al-mujtanā (number 552).

Index of Titles

Numbers refer to the respective entry number as listed in Chapter 5, not the page number. In contrast, numbers in brackets preceded by p refer to page numbers in Chapters 1 to 4 and the narrative section of chapter 5.

Titles in the form of 'Amāli/Arba'in/'Awāli/Fawā'id/Ḥadīth/Juz'/Majālis/Majlis/Masā'il + name' are not indexed as they can be easily identified via the author index. Generic titles such as 'Ashyā'' are also not indexed as they can be more easily identified via the content index.
