Acknowledgement

First of all I would like to thank my supervisors Dieter Kleiber (Freie Universität Berlin) and Denis Hilton (Université de Toulouse). This French-German Dissertation could not have been accomplished without their support.

I would like to express my gratitude to Bärbel Knäuper for her support, patience and encouragement throughout the years. In her I found an excellent listener with whom I could share my interests and concerns about this work. Her advice was essential to the completion of this dissertation. She taught me countless things and provided me with insights in the work of academic research in general.

Special thanks also to Jens Eiserman for his inspiring way to guide me to a deeper understanding of matters and for his encouragement during the completion of this dissertation.

My thanks also go to Helmut Leder for his support and for providing me with a productive working environment.

Thanks also to Albrecht Iseler for supporting me as a research associate at the Freie Universität Berlin.

I would also like to thank Chuck Tate for his support, his help with refining my English, and for all our interesting discussions concerning this work.

I am also grateful to everyone in Germany, France and Canada who contributed to this work by providing technical support, helping with language issues or by participating in one of the studies.

Last, but not least, I would like to thank my family for their dedication and encouragement over many years during my undergraduate and graduate studies. Their support provided the foundation of this work.

Financial support for my stays at the Université de Toulouse was provided by the Deutsch-Französische Hochschule (DFH). Financial support for one of my stays at McGill University was provided by the EAESP.
