

Acknowledgments

This dissertation was conducted at the Department of Health Psychology at the Free University Berlin. The project was part of the DFG-sponsored graduate program Psychiatry and Psychology of Aging (GK429/1-98), which is a joint initiative of the Free University Berlin and the Max Planck Institute for Human Development. The Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft (DFG) financed this research with a pre-doctoral stipend.

I wish to thank Prof. Dr. Ralf Schwarzer for generously sharing his abundant scientific expertise with me in the mentoring of this dissertation. I am also very grateful for the opportunity to participate in the graduate program Psychiatry and Psychology of Aging. Warm thanks go to all members of the program's Steering Committee for providing advice, copious support, and the most stimulating environment for studying gerontology. Also, I would like to thank all my fellow participants in the program for their feedback, support, and friendship throughout the past three years.

Conducting this study would not have been possible without the generous help of the various ophthalmology departments and hospitals. I am indebted to Prof. Dr. Ch. Hartmann and Prof. Dr. N. Anders of the Berlin Virchow Hospital and Prof. Dr. N. Pfeiffer, PD Dr. B. Dick, and Dr. O. Schwenn of the Mainz University Hospital for their support of our project.

Very special thanks go to Nina Rieckmann, my co-investigator in this project, who is a terrific colleague and a very dear friend. I am immensely thankful for her calmness in demanding situations, her always challenging advice, and her kind encouragement and support.

I would also like to thank all my colleagues at the department for their invaluable advice and technical support. Special thanks go to Mary Wegner, who proofread this manuscript with incredible patience. Thanks to Bärbel Günther for sharing with me her expertise on formatting documents and getting printers to work. Also, I wish to thank Urte Scholz and Falko Sniehotta for unprecedented comments on the flexibility issue.

Above all, I am grateful to my parents, Ute and Wolfgang Knoll, for their love, unlimited patience, and support -- for long phone calls, for a more balanced perspective on things, and for convincing me that everything will be alright.
